ridicule for his pains when he first advanced the theory of the migration of continents, but many men of science today have veered to his belief. A mass of data collected in recent years by several sciences, including geophysics, geology, paleontology, astronomy and geodesy, have contributed to its support.

TODAY a Prime Minister of Great Britain has to travel 3,000 miles to reach England's one-time neighbor, America. Some millions of years before United States Senators began to wrangle about entangling alliances with Europe there was, according to the hypothesis of the migration of continents, a physical entangling alliance. New York was close up against Belgium. North America and South America were joined with Africa, Asia and Europe in one continent. Australia and New Guinea and the whole chain of islands to the north were united to the truncated tail of Asia.

Leonardo da Vinci heard thunder from the Vatican when he discovered the remains of marine animals on the top of an Italian mountain. Fossils which have been collected in many parts of Europe by scientists sent abroad by Princeton University and the Smithsonian Institution show that as recently as 25,000,000 years ago some sort of a land "bridge" must have existed connecting Europe and America.

For marine remains in rocks in the northern parts of Newfoundland were found to be identical with fossils of the same age in Wales, Scotland, Norway and Denmark. Those geologists who adhere to the belief that the earth once consisted of one immense piece of land point to the similarity between plant and animal life in the jungles of South America and in the wilderness of Africa, and evidence of a relationship between animal life in Southern Asia and Australia is not lacking.

When mighty interior forces began to rend the single continent and make its giant fragments move horizontally to other parts of the world, did the animals of the time appreciate the drama? Were the dinosaurs with their thunderous tread, the grotesquely toothed birds, the early, small timid mammals of those distant times conscious of the "cataclysm"? Probably not. For the motions of the earth were exceedingly slow, much too slow for bedlam.

As the opening between the Western Hemisphere and Europe and Africa slowly widened, water welled into the fissure. This opening, grown in width to about 3,000 miles, we know today as the Atlantic Ocean.

The propelling forces crumpled up the rocks along the front of each moving continental block, forming mountain chains like the Andes, the Rockies and the Himalayas. According to Dr. Daly's hypothesis, these blocks moved under simple gravity. He supposes the previous distortions of the figure of the earth to have caused the unequal operation of gravity at the earth's surface, with a tendency to pull the rigid continental sheets in certain directions, causing them to "slide downhill" over the weak, glassy layer which is believed to underlie the rocky crust of the earth.

There is some disagreement, even among those scientists who hold that the theory of continental migration has now been well substantiated, as to the cause leading to the break-up of the one continent that originally covered our globe. Sir Oliver Lodge, explaining that the ejection of the moon from the earth is held to be the best explanation, says:

"When the moon broke away from the earth there was no liquid water or reasonable atmosphere and the planet had no semblance of what it is now. But long after the moon departed the scar left by it would be deep and all the water would accumulate there, when water could make its appearance. There would be a tendency for solid matter to fall and move so as to fill up the cavity. Moreover, a great floating mass of land might break up and a part of it drift away from the rest."

Are our continents still drifting apart? If such a movement is still going on, the longitude of the continents must be changing. A plan has been devised by an international committee of scientists to answer the question by a ten-year program of observation of longitudes of fixed points in America and Europe.

"Man Is Learning to Harness for His Inquiring Use the Very Wrath of the Earth."

It has taken much time for the crustal blocks of the earth, so tumultuously jammed together and piled one on another, to settle into a state of equilibrium. Along the zone of the mountain chains over the world the rocks are still breaking, snapping, slipping on the planes or fractures or faults. Each time the strained crust suddenly breaks, one block moving feet or inches past its neighbor, an earthquake jars the body of the earth.

The earth's crust in California, for example, had undergone a progressive strain for many years previous to the San Francisco earthquake of 1906. Geological forces were tending to shear the State into two parts. A broad strip of land tended to move to the southeast, while another broad strip of the crust tended to move to the northwest. The strength of the crust for a long time resisted these two tendencies. At last, at a certain moment in the year 1906 the two contrary forces reached the elastic limit of the earth's crust, and the crust broke.

Sometimes fractures are developed clear through the solid crust of the earth. Hence lava rises from the substratum along these fissures, causing volcanoes—the "chimneys of hell," where medieval philosophers wished all their enemies to go.

The Sea-God of Greek mythology, Proteus, had the power of constantly changing his looks. Since the world began, neither land nor water has worn exactly the same face. The mighty forces of nature, working through rushing rivers, restless glaciers, roaring winds and pounding oceans, carve out new and gloriously impressive features on the face of the earth. And our earth, having lived through so many wars in the past, is still battling, a lined face, a few scars or some wrinkles tracing the dramatic story.

Picture the American scene before physical changes had transformed it. Not so long ago, in a geological sense, New York, Boston, Chicago, St. Louis and Miami were under water. A shallow sea stretching from Texas to Yukon cut the continental plateau of North America in two. The whole of the flat plain from New Jersey to Florida was covered with sea water. At one time the ocean surf broke on the old Appalachian Mountains where the southeastern part of the mountain structure had sunk below the sea.

THIS part became covered with a layer of sand and mud thickening seaward. The wedge-like mass of marine sediment was then uplifted and cut into by rivers, giving the Atlantic coastal plain of the United States.

Why did that strip of land along the Atlantic Coast emerge out of the water? The answer geologists offer tends to explain the cause of glaciers. During the glacial period, a few tens of thousands of years ago, the sea level fell everywhere because much water was evaporated from the ocean to build glaciers, since melted away. The resulting world-wide emergence of the "drowned" coasts is estimated to have reached as much as 300 feet. The formation of even that residual of the Ice Age, the ice cap on Antarctica, has lowered sea level everywhere on the globe by something like 100 feet.

Sea level has changed again within recent years. Various parcels of land previously submerged in different parts of the globe, but especially in Samoa, have lifted their heads unexpectedly on the body of the sea. Field studies along islands and continental shores in all of the ocean basins show that there has been a world-wide sinking of the sea of about fifteen feet.

The cause is best sought in a moderate thickening of Antarctic ice. The withdrawal of water from the ocean to cause this fifteen-foot drop in sea-level, despite its great quantity, would account for but a fraction of the Antarctic ice cap facing Rear Admiral Byrd and his expedition in the great white silence of a frozen world.

The geologist, busy at his ingenious task of decoding the history of the rocks under our feet, is no longer alone in his keen interest regarding the interior of the earth. More and more are the other sciences besides geology turning inquiring eyes in the direction of the secrets hidden inside our globe. From the biologist examining minute matter with test tubes and microscopes to the astronomer probing gigantic celestial systems far, far away—all men of science now know that their task would be easier if they were not so uninformed concerning the earth's interior. For that region of the planet has served and is now serving as the stage for "a gripping drama" which, if we could understand better, would enable us to comprehend more clearly all the various phases that go to make up the whole cosmic picture.

A more immediate, and from the standpoint of human civilization some years hence, a more vital question is entwined in our study of the earth's interior. Sources of power are rapidly diminishing. Modern civilization is built on power. How is it to go on when our supply of oil and coal runs out, as it will in the not too distant future?

Inside our earth is something more valuable than limited deposits of gold, diamonds, oil and gas. It is an inexhaustible source of heat. By going down several miles into the bowels of the earth we can tap this unlimited reservoir of energy and power. The problems to be surmounted now appear too great. But there is the promise that as our knowledge of the earth's interior increases, those problems will not loom so large.

are my father of music. I have never felt you so near to me as I do now. Wherever life brings me, whether east, west, north or south, I will always hear your sweet voice. That voice which ofttimes corrected me, and if I would be without it, only God knows what kind of life I would lead. Your loving pupil.

"YEHUDI MENUHIN."

The last sentence brings a humorous twinkle to Mr. Persinger's eyes.

At the recent concert given by young Menuhin to a packed house in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Persinger was in the audience and at his side sat an intense, silent little figure, with lips tight and hands clenched. It was Ruggiero Ricci, come to hear his master's former pupil.

Yehudi Menuhin is 13. Ruggiero Ricci is 9. The two boys are entirely different in background and in personality. The first is fair-haired, blue-eyed, poised and articulate. The second is black-haired, dark-eyed, temperamentally restless and as yet inarticulate when it comes to telling what is going on in his mind. He can do infinitely more with his instrument than with his voice.

Ruggiero Ricci was brought to Mr. Persinger by the lad's father, a trombone player in rather poor circumstances. There are five Ricci children besides Ruggiero. All of them have learned to play an instrument of some kind and Ricci's papa used to show off his little family orchestra on festive occasions. Occasionally they were paid for it. Ruggiero attended a public school in San Francisco and music was one of the subjects he failed in. He came rather reluctantly to play before Mr. Persinger and chose "The Blue Bells of Scotland" as the vehicle of his virtuosity. Mr. Persinger was convinced that his gift was unusual, and began giving the boy lessons. Ruggiero made progress, though not at the rate expected of him.

"His background handicapped him," Mr. Persinger explained. "Lessons at school, a family of many children, the wrong attitude toward the importance of his work, all these operated against him and me. My assistant, Miss Elizabeth Lackey, had watched me with the boy and grew interested in him. He responded to her sympathy and when she asked his parents to let her keep him for a week-end he was delighted. He came for many week-ends and before long he was staying with her. Before very long it was obvious to us that the change in his environment was making a vast amount of difference in his work. When Miss Lackey came to New York Ruggiero and his brother accompanied her. They are now living with her. Young Ruggiero possesses what all artists in music must possess, a true ear and sense of rhythm. In spite of his youth he brings to music the emotion that is part of music itself, an inherent understanding of the composer's message. That, perhaps, is the kernel of genius."

Ricci is still much more of a child than Menuhin. When he is not studying music or when he is not being tutored he likes to play with toy trains and airplanes. When he gave his Chicago recital the thing that pleased him most in all the tumultuous acclaim was an electric airplane that one of his admirers handed to him over the footlights. His sense of critical values is faultless. Some time ago he was half-seriously asked to give his opinion about some of the leading violinists of today. One, he said, he didn't like because of his mannerisms, another he declared to be occasionally careless, and a third, he said, had splendid left-hand technique, but no feeling. About his own playing, he is without mercy in judgment. When complimented by one critic on his Chicago recital he replied very seriously, "I played a whole lot of things out of tune."

Recently Mr. Persinger had a few records made of his playing for future comparison. They were excellently executed, but when young Ricci heard them his face saddened. "I didn't know I played so rotten," he said. There was no pose about him; he is too young and too natural to make a grand gesture. Good reviews of his work are rarely read to him; the poor ones he sees and often he agrees with them. Menuhin he adores and respects much more than any of the adult violinists, and nothing brings him as much happiness as to be told that some day he will be as great. There are some, as a matter of fact, who say that his emotional interpretation is even greater today than is the older boy's.

ANAGRAMS IS AN ANCIENT GAME

THE game of anagrams, which is today popular as furnishing mind stimulation, hilarity and argument, is derived from a custom of ancient origin which at various times in history rose to the dignity of a craze. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the anagrammatizing of proper names was a fashionable amusement of the witty and learned, and in the reign of Louis XIII a Thomas Billon is mentioned as receiving a pension of 1,200 livres as anagrammatist to the King.

The term anagram in its proper sense means the letters of one or several words written backward, being derived from two Greek words—ana, "backward," and gramma, "word," but it generally denotes a transposition of the letters of a word or sentence so that a new word or sentence is formed.

A famous anagram is formed of the question put by Pilate to the Saviour, out of which was evolved its own answer. Pilate asked, "Quid est veritas?" (What is truth?), and the anagrammatic reply is "Vir qui adest" (The man who stands before you). Among the Romans two kinds of anagrams were in use, one formed as in "Roma," "amor," and the other by merely dividing the word selected into several parts, the god "Terminus" becoming "ter minus." Two classic Greek anagrams have come down to us from Lycophron, who lived B. C. 280, one referring to Ptolemy Philadelphus, and the other to his Queen, Arsinoë.

Several well-known anagrams have come down from later days. Napoleon I was probably subject to more lampoons than any other man. On his return from Elba the following imperfect but appropriate anagram was circulated: "Napoleon Bonaparte! (No, appear not at Elba!)" as was also "Napoleon Bonaparte—Bona rapta leno pone! (Rascal, yield up your stolen possessions!)"

A suitable anagram was devised for Florence Nightingale, "Flit on, cheering angel!" worthy, as has been said, of being chiseled on her tomb as an epitaph. When the Earl of Beaconsfield was defeated in 1880, his title was converted into the phrase "Self-fooled; can he bear it?" The names of other well-known personages were twisted around as follows: William Ewart Gladstone: A man to wield great wills; Alfred Tennyson, Poet Laureate: Neat sonnet of deep tearful lay; and Marie Antoinette: Tear it, men; I atone.

MORE than 55 per cent of the population of Canada is of British origin, and almost 28 per cent is of French origin, according to a recent study made by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. MOTHER GOOSE RAISES A GALE

Whether Her Rhymes Are Rubbish or A Priceless Heritage Is the Question

By MILDRED ADAMS

ECHOES of the Mother Goose dispute still go rumbling through scholastic halls and in houses where children live. It reached the peak of argument some weeks ago, when professors were quoted in acrimonious interviews, and experts snapped at each other across columns of print, but unlike many verbal battles it was not ended by one sharp tilt.

The reason seems to be that this is one of those perpetual arguments which is founded on deep-lying human differences. It has raged intermittently ever since the old rhymes rose from a precarious and shifting life on the streets to the dignity of published pages. Between the people who say that Mother Goose rhymes are rubbish and the ones who regard them as the priceless heritage of all English-speaking peoples, there is no possibility of permanent peace. Sometimes the quarrel lies quiet, and there is no illusion of agreement. Then some one makes a rash statement and the whole difference of opinion bursts to the surface. It happened this Winter just as it happened in the days of Coleridge and Charles Lamb. For a week or two a group of verses hundreds of years old became the latest news. Memories were brushed off and refurbished. Prejudices were polished until they shot forth indignant beams. Every one was convinced of the essential rightness of his position.

The latest attack started at Teachers' College and the ensuing argument took its sputtering way through public utterance and private conversation. Nor was it confined to the educators. Mothers and fathers and aunts might abstain from reactions and I Q's, but they had definite ideas on the subject of Mother Goose. Groups, met to study the child, became partisans bent on defending a faith. Dinner tables ceased to be places of polite debate and broke into open argument. Even dance floors were not safe against the fury of discussion, and at least one betrothal was broken on the ground that the would-be husband saw no sense in fairy tales.

Fairy tales and stories of animal emprise were included in the general indictment. Mother Goose became the standard bearer for pale princesses and knights in gleaming armor. Dragons and ogres and dwarfs, talking horses and dogs of supernatural wisdom ranged about her ample skirts, belabored by earnest folk who believed that facts are more to be desired than fantasy and that spinach is more potent than a wizard's mind.

Mothers and fathers of the past had heard at various times that Mother Goose was illogical, absurd, ungrammatical, inimical to morality. This time they were told the same kind of thing, but not in the same terms. Modern education has a patter which is very different from the one popular in the last century. It was not the morals of the child which were endangered, but his adjustment to reality. The twig was not to be bent, but the child mind was to be conditioned.

The issue was joined. People who had always believed that fairy tales were utterly ridiculous rejoiced that at last some one had had the courage to put convictions into words. People whose minds loved fantasy recoiled at this latest outrage of the literal and the material. The champions of facts delivered tirades against anything which would retard a child's adjustment to reality by encouraging him to take refuge in the pleasanter world of the imagination. Romanticists railed at realists and the admirers of reality sneered back. The individualist rose up to champion the rights of man against mass ideas, and every one accused every one else of having no sense of humor.

The tempest boiled over the teapot's edge and spilled out old grievances. All modern education became suspect. The old resentment against experts who presume to tell mothers what is best for their children surged to the surface, and mutterings were revived about "old maids who call themselves educators" and "people who won't even let you pick up a baby when it cries."

As a matter of fact, modern educators were by no means of one mind on the subject of Mother Goose. Teachers College itself developed sharp differences of opinion within its own faculty. Even psychologists ceased to function purely as even-tempered observers, and showed signs of developing the very prejudices which in other people they find so interesting. It was no use to ask for the authoritative opinion of this educational sect or that. At the question a teaching staff bound together by a creed fell apart into a collection of individuals holding divergent views, all of them well bolstered by the same technical vocabulary. Mother Goose, like Scripture, was quotable by both sides.

The more moderate of the moderns tended to deplore the whole controversy. The necessary thing, they said, was not a book to supplant Mother Goose, but something to supplement her. They agreed that she was popular, but they felt that children needed facts as well as fancies, and that books which, with accuracy and literary skill, told them about subways and skyscrapers, the postman, the milkman and the engineer, would help to balance Three Blind Mice and the blackbird pie.

THEY did not believe in unlimited freedom of choice by the child any more than they believed in unlimited censorship, and they felt that the proportion of fact and fancy which Mary Smith needed was a thing to be determined only by a thorough knowledge of Mary Smith. Even age lines gave way before the vagaries of the individual child. Experience had shown that, considered in large groups, children of certain ages did like certain books, that Mother Goose was most popular with children under 6, and fairy tales with children over 9. Yet Peter might go on singing about Banbury Cross when he was 7, while Jane adored Cinderella at the age of 5.

The controversy over Mother Goose, like all arguments which have to do with such fundamental things as children and homes and literature and individual temperament, is a thing so closely bound up with emotion and prejudice that any attitude of impartiality is almost repellant. Yet there is more here than emotion and prejudice. There is, for instance, the fundamental difference of opinion between people who regard verses and folktales and fairy stories as part of the precious treasure of mankind, to be passed on for the delight of each succeeding generation, and the people who think of them as teaching material to be used for the purpose of preparing children for life.

THAT difference is not to be reconciled by any amount of explanation, by any attempt at patient understanding. One serious-minded soul took the tale of Peter and his little horse Trott Trott, and made it a vehicle for urging small boys and girls to drink milk. And lovers of the quaint old tale threw up both hands and grew either very explicit or very incoherent, according to the way in which rage affected their tongues. Both groups believe in the eminent rightness of their cause. One regards health as more important than stories, the other believes that no one has a right to lay sacrilegious hands on a folktale and pervert it into something meant to teach a momentary lesson.

The use of stories to teach the lessons of health is a curious modern revival of the old literature of morality. In the age of Victoria a perfect flood of books rolled off the presses designed to teach children not to lie, not to steal, to obey their parents and learn their lessons. The Rollo books and the Elsie Dinsmore series were the best known, but back of these flowed a stream of saccharine literature which made Rollo and Elsie seem like obstreperous young rebels. Sunday school libraries were full of them, popular wood cuts and steel engravings showed little children kneeling in prayer to ask divine forgiveness for some such heinous sin as pulling the cat's tail. Every story had a moral.

Rollo and Elsie have both become objects of ridicule in this irreverent age, and even Sunday school libraries have replaced the little brown volumes of goodness with books a bit more robust. But that does not mean that children are to be left to draw their own conclusions. To be a good child no longer means that one can repeat a stated quota of psalms. In the modern idiom it denotes a willingness to eat spinach and baked apples on command. And so, in the modern version of the old tale, Little Peter drinks milk and eats his cereal and grows big enough to lift his horse Trott Trott. "And the moral of that is—."

The advocates of using reading matter to teach lessons plead that they seek the greatest good of the child. But their critics insist that there are pitfalls in the syllogisms of science just as there were in the syllogisms of morality. Cereal and milk make children grow this year, though next year's dietary discoveries may prove them to be injurious. But even this year all children who eat cereal and drink milk do not grow up to be big and strong and lift horses. Some of them go skating and fall through thin ice, while others take to fast airplanes.

The Mother Goose controversy has been going on ever since the rhymes were first made into a book, which, in this country at least, was 1719. The tale of the book's making sounds at this distance as mixed a matter of fact and fancy as any one of the rhymes. As told in a twentieth century reprinting of the little eighteenth century volume, it concerns a veritable Mrs. Goose. She had one daughter, Elizabeth, who married Mr. T. Fleet of the print shop at the corner of Pudding Lane.

No less a person than Cotton Mather performed the ceremony. Up to that time he was more famous for burning witches and cutting off Quakers' ears than for any interest in children or rhymes, but he was to have a great deal of influence in nurseries. Had he not married this particular pair there might have been no Mother Goose rhymes, for it was the subsequent birth of their child which so inspired the newly made grandmother that she went about the house singing all the songs of her personal guest of the President of the United States to a simple cabin in the foothills of the Blue Ridge, that there, quiet and undisturbed, they may speak together of the great issues and the little ones which divide peoples and which bind peoples together.

BUTLER HAILS PEACE ERA

"This is no conspiracy to organize war. It is a conference to build peace. There is the difference.

"Public confidence has succeeded in displacing secrecy, conference has routed conspiracy, and the authority of free peoples and their public opinion is underneath, behind and all about what the Prime Minister and the President have said and done."

I asked what part the Paris peace pact would play in avoiding wars.

"On Aug. 2, 1928," Mr. Butler replied, "the civilized world through its organized governments formally and solemnly condemned recourse to wars for the solution of international controversies, and the several governments renounced war as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another. They further agreed that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin which may arise among them shall never be sought except by pacific means.

"This declaration, applauded from Pole to Pole and the whole world round, is of so stupendous importance that it is even now most imperfectly understood.

"In his haste, the Psalmist said, 'All men are liars.' Unless all men and all governments are liars, national policies will, without delay, be adjusted to the new international life that has been so gratefully brought into being.

"Gone is the fear for national security; gone is the argument for compulsory military service and huge standing armies; gone is the plea for the protection of sea-borne commerce and a navy as powerful as any in the world; gone is the haste to build bombing planes and to store up vast supplies of poison gas; gone is the whole gospel of preparedness for a war which is promised never to be fought—gone are all these unless all men and all governments are liars!"

It was dusk. The pink sky with its purple clouds was luminous behind the massive buildings in which lights began to appear. The unfinished tower of the new church loomed vast and graceful and tall.

"Then," I asked, "you think the last war has been fought?"

Dr. Butler looked serious, and then in the half darkness, he replied:

They have no pact to sign—our happy dead,
But if, O God, if we should sign in vain,
With dreadful eyes, out of each narrow bed,
Our dead will rise again!

HUNTING WITH THE BOW IS AGAIN LEGAL.

NEW YORK has resumed the bow and arrow of the Mohawks and Cayugas to such extent that the State Government has rescinded the law against using this weapon in hunting game. Up to last year the taking of most wild creatures was restricted to rifle or shotgun "held at arm's length."

That henceforth game protected by law can be "legally taken by the long bow" is not necessarily a compliment to the archery clubs, who suggested the restoration to all present citizens of the privilege withdrawn from the Indians long ago. The Conservation Commission agreed because it would "result in a saving of game," the bow's range being short and the skill required in its successful use being high and rare.

Yehudi Menuhin and Ruggiero Ricci as They Are Seen Through the Eyes of Their Teacher and Friend

By ROSE C. FELD

WHAT Leopold Auer has been to the great concert violinists of today Louis Persinger may be to the violinists of tomorrow. He it is who a little more than two years ago presented Yehudi Menuhin, at that time 11 years old, to a surprised and enraptured audience at Carnegie Hall. More recently, Ruggiero Ricci, the little Italian boy, now barely 9, made his début under the same direction. Critics are agreed that both boys possess or are possessed by that spark commonly known as genius. Young Menuhin's achievement and growth during the past two years have definitely proved his virtuosity. Young Ricci has not yet had as great opportunity to show his talent. His years of study have been shorter and his presentation to the public more recent. After talking to Mr. Persinger, however, one feels that no mistake has been made in this child, either. Persinger loves his art too deeply and feels his responsibility too greatly to say that genius exists where it is absent.

Although he is an American, Louis Persinger has been better known abroad than here. Before he turned to orchestral work he himself was a concert violinist of note. During his early childhood he lived in a remote village of Colorado and grew up with the idea that the world was peopled with more red men than white. His own ability on the violin prompted a wealthy music lover to send him to Leipzig where he studied under the great masters of that city. Arthur Nikisch, the famous German conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic, was one of them and it was he who said that Persinger was "one of the most talented pupils the Leipzig Conservatory has ever had"—rare praise from him. Ysaye heard Persinger play and forthwith invited him to come to Brussels as violin soloist with the Concert du Vauxhall, Ysaye's orchestra, where he stayed for three years. He also worked with Thibaud in Paris.

When he took up concert work he was a fully rounded artist. In the season of 1912-13 he made a tour of America. Later he returned to Berlin to be concert master under Nikisch—no small achievement. The war brought an end to his European sojourn and he accepted an offer of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra to become its concert master and assistant director.

Neither Yehudi Menuhin nor Ruggiero Ricci was born then. Both boys are natives of San Francisco. It is interesting to speculate on what would have happened to them if Persinger had settled down in St. Louis or New York. Would their genius have been recognized and brought to light, or would some others now be hailed as America's child prodigies?

Persinger gives the impression of being a gentle and at the same time an intense person. The writer came into his studio while he was finishing a lesson with one of his New York pupils. The instructor sat and gave quiet direction. There were no pyrotechnics either in voice or accompaniment, no dominance, no impatience. He was gently discussing the meaning of a passage and the way it could be expressed by the bowing hand. The room was surprisingly free of stress and "temperament." One felt that there was understanding between master and pupil.

In a manner of speaking, it was not Persinger who discovered Menuhin but Menuhin who discovered Persinger. The boy, from early childhood, was taken by his parents to hear the concerts of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. He sat up front and was deeply moved by the playing and personality of the concert master.

"I, too," says Persinger, speaking of this period, "was attracted by the grave demeanor of this almost infantile listener, but apart from noticing him at each concert, I knew nothing about him. A friend of the Menuhins and mine, a cantor in San Francisco, spoke to me about a youngster who seemed to show great talent, whom he wanted me to hear. I put the audition off from time to time; I had heard so many children whose parents and friends were convinced they were unusually endowed. Finally, an appointment was made and the boy came to me. I recognized him at once. He was 6 years old at the time, a very plump little lad with a serious expression. Quietly he put the instrument under his chin and began to play. He was half through when I stopped him. I shall never forget the fury that lit up in his eyes at my interruption. It was an insult to him and his art. But I had heard enough. There was no doubt in my mind that something lay hidden there. His feeling for rhythm was splendid, his ear absolutely true. There was more, besides—a potentiality for greatness."

Young Menuhin became the pupil of Persinger and under the latter's direction and guidance developed the powers that were his. Not the least important influence in his musical growth was the background in which he lived. Both parents of young Menuhin are students and lovers of the arts. His father was a teacher in a Hebrew school when Yehudi first began to work under Persinger. The boy was taught at home by his mother. From the very start it was recognized that music was the world in which the child was happiest. Everything else was made secondary to that. Two younger sisters who today show great talent on the piano shared with him the sheltered life his parents created for them.

"Conditions for study were ideal," said Mr. Persinger. "No matter how talented a child is, you can't expect him to go to his instrument with energy and enthusiasm after he has spent the better part of the day in a classroom. His mind and his emotions are tired and he brings nothing that is alive or creative to his music. Art is too stern a taskmaster to accept that kind of devotion. Once convinced that a child has an unusual artistic gift, its development must come first. Other things take second place. I do not mean that mental and intellectual faculties should be neglected. That would be fatal.

"The completely satisfying artist is one whose life is completely rounded, one who is interested in things outside his art as well as those essential to it. Imagination and emotion play an important part in expression, and the more an artist is in key with the world about him the more he brings to his art. But again, I say, the important thing is the cultivation of his art. Nothing else is really important. This is not as extreme as it sounds. An adult desiring distinction in a chosen career devotes all his time to it. A child genius may be young in years, but artistically, musically, he is beyond years. Young Menuhin may be a boy of 13 today, but his playing is not that of a boy of 13. It is that of a maturing musical genius. In many respects he is still a child, but musically he has long passed childhood."

Throughout his work with Menuhin, Persinger guided himself by the child's growing powers and strength. He never forced him. At first, practice was limited to an hour and a half a day. Gradually the time was increased until it became four hours. It rarely exceeded that. The hours of lessons were not always filled with bowing and finger technique. The music room became a laboratory where compositions were taken apart technically and artistically. The meaning of a phrase, of a melody, of nuance, was as important as the mastery of fingering.

"A child may be born with genius," explained Mr. Persinger, "and what that is, I cannot explain. It is an ear so true that the sound of a false note brings pain, it is a deep-lying rhythmic sense, it is an emotional richness and a reaching out toward understanding of beauty and truth in music. But a child doesn't rise from the cradle knowing good taste and style in music, a child isn't born with an interpretative sense. That only somebody older, who has saturated himself with what the masters of music can teach him, can help him to acquire. In time he may outstrip his master, but there must be direction at the start.

"To explain to a child between 6 and 11, let us say, what Beethoven and Tchaikovsky are saying in their music is no easy task. One day, for example, I wanted Yehudi to get a voluptuous tone for a special passage we were studying. What does voluptuous mean to a child? I told him the story of Cleopatra floating down the Nile in one of her gorgeously fitted boats; I described the rich silks and the tapestries with which she was surrounded, the luscious fruits which she and her hand-maidens were eating, the indolence and the grace of her posture. We talked a great deal about Cleopatra that day and then I asked him to play the given passage so that it would portray the picture we had made. He got what I was driving at. He invariably did. Once we took up a piece by Revel. We hadn't done much with him before; the style and expression were new to the boy. He played it over interestedly and when he finished, before I had an opportunity to make any comment he said, 'That makes me think of an octopus kissing somebody. It's sticky and not very pleasant.' "

And yet, Mr. Persinger insists, young Menuhin is not a boy who is unpleasantly precocious. He likes playing with his sisters, he is interested in outdoor life and has an intense curiosity about bugs and machinery. The relationship between his teacher and himself has always been one of happy comradeship. During their hours together they discussed many things that had no bearing on music. When the boy left San Francisco at the close of 1926 to give two concerts in Paris and from there to go on to Rumania to have a course of study under Enescu, he penned a boyish and childlike letter to his teacher while he was on the train.

"Sweet Master," he wrote, "As the train is going eastward, within me are growing sentiments. For, as soon as we parted, last night, I felt that lonely sensation, the one which I had just a year ago for my father. Indeed, Mr. Persinger, you

LONDON'S OWN "MAYOR'S NEST"

The Mansion House, Scene of Many Historic Entertainments, Is to Be Renovated

By HAYDEN CHURCH

LONDON.

LONDON'S Mansion House, which has been made world famous by historic speeches delivered within its walls and mighty relief funds with which its name is associated, has begun to show signs of wear and tear. After a career of close on two centuries, the official home of London's Lord Mayors has become shabby, both inside and out, and a scheme for its renovation is now in active preparation.

Standing in the heart of the mile-square "City" of London, over which the Lord Mayor, during his one year of office, holds sway, with the Bank of England as one near neighbor and the Royal Exchange as another, the Mansion House, since its completion in 1753, has housed 176 chief executives of what is said to be "the richest square mile in the world."

Among other things, the Mansion House is probably unique among official buildings in being a residence, a court of justice and a prison. The Lord Mayor of London, by virtue of his office, is a police magistrate and, as such, presides twice a week over a court held at the Mansion House and dispenses justice to offenders who, while awaiting trial, are confined in cells in the basement. Only a door separates the Lord Mayor's residence from the justice room and the place of durance vile.

Located in the centre of what one might describe as the "Wall Street district" of the metropolis, the Mansion House stands on one of the most valuable sites in the world. But the ground rent paid for that site is only $50 a year. The land is not owned by the Corporation of the City of London, as is commonly supposed, but by the rector of the parish of St. Mary Woolnoth, in near-by Lombard Street, with which parish is combined the quaintly named one of St. Mary Woolchurch-Haw. The Mansion House stands partly on the site of St. Mary Woolchurch, which was burned down in the great fire of London. Soon after the fire, this parish was amalgamated with St. Mary Woolnoth, and when the Mansion House was built at the end of the eighteenth century the corporation agreed to pay the rector of the combined parishes the sum of £10 a year as ground rent.

So the rector of today receives $25 every half year for the site of the Mansion House which is valued at about $7,000,000. Unfortunately for the rector, too, the corporation's lease is a perpetual one. If they chose, they could pull down the Mansion House, rebuild it somewhere else, and make an enormous profit on the transaction by subletting the site.

WHENEVER a great disaster occurs, either in this country or abroad, it is the custom for the Lord Mayor to open a fund for the sufferers and the records for the last sixty years show that, during that time, more than $60,000,000 has thus been raised and distributed for the relief of distress.

The earliest and one of the most interesting Mansion House funds was started in January, 1871, for the sufferers by the siege of Paris after the Franco-Prussian war and the Commune. Within a fortnight of the funds being opened such a large sum had been collected that the Lord Mayor's Committee was able, although with much difficulty, to take to Paris sixty-eight tons of provisions and personally superintend their distribution among the famished inhabitants by the priests and clergy, foreign consuls and others.

Another of the most memorable funds was that initiated in September, 1878, on the occasion of the loss, through a collision in broad daylight on the Thames, of the steamer Princess Alice, with the loss of more than 600 lives. The appalling disaster and the harrowing incidents attending it elicited an outburst of sympathy throughout the country on behalf of the sufferers. In all $190,000 was raised. Of that sum $7,000, principally in coppers, was placed in the box outside the Mansion House by passers-by.

If an inquisitive American were to ask a thousand Londoners how the money to build the Mansion House was obtained, it is possible, but highly improbable, that he might discover one who knew. The answer is that the sum needed, about $350,000 (which meant a lot more then than it does now) was largely derived from fines inflicted on persons who refused to fill the office of sheriff of the city of London. Most of those who thus declined are said to have done so on conscientious grounds, but it seems likely that others found it distinctly cheaper to pay the fine involved $5,000, for the sheriffs, who rank next to the Lord Mayor, are stated, at the end of their term of office, to be some $30,000 poorer.

Previous to the great fire the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the city of London lived on their business premises, as did their families and staffs. That, by the way, was the reason for the existence of the great number of city churches built both before and after the fire.

AS early as 1670 an official home for the Lord Mayor was being considered, but it was not until 1728 that the corporation appointed a committee to select a proper site, procure building plans and consider ways and means of defraying the cost. One of these latter has already been mentioned, and it is on record that, by 1736, the fines from persons who would not be sheriffs amounted to the equivalent of $103,000.

The committee and their advisers considered and inspected many sites and finally, in 1735, selected that of the old Stocks Market on which the building now stands. There was great delay in getting on with the work of erection, and it was not until October, 1739, that Micajah Perry, Lord Mayor of that year, laid the chief corner stone in full civic state. Fourteen more years elapsed before Sir Crisp Gascoigne, an ancestor of the Marquess of Salisbury, entered into residence. There have been 175 Lord Mayors since then.

It is understood that the scheme for renovating the Mansion House involves considerable alterations to the Egyptian Hall. This is the principal dining room of the Mansion House and holds 4,000 guests. It already has been altered more than any room in the building, but is still so dark that artificial light has constantly to be used. Some of its windows contain beautiful stained glass, but there are still recesses built for windows in which no windows have yet been placed. It is now planned to open these recesses and give the Egyptian Hall a bit more of the daylight it so badly needs.

In this impressive dining room, with its fine statues and rich tapestries, a great number of distinguished Americans have been entertained at one time or another. One of these was the late Walter Hines Page who, during his Ambassadorship, was the principal guest at a function at which he presented an American flag to the city of London. Other famous Americans who have been heard in this room include James Russell Lowell, John Lothrop Motley, E. J. Phelps (who there enunciated the comforting assurance that "a man who never makes mistakes never makes anything"), John Hay, Joseph H. Choate and Whitelaw Reid.

TURKEY: A NATION REMADE IN A DECADE

It Has Cast Aside the Old Forms of Government and Adopted Modern Ideas

TEN years ago next Tuesday the Turkish National pact was signed by the Nationalist Deputies of the old Ottoman Parliament in Constantinople. Put forward in the remnant of an empire which the war had shaken to pieces with the force of an earthquake, and in a capital which had been seized by allied troops, the pact was a demand for independence on the part of the beaten and largely disarmed Turks.

"It is a fundamental condition of our life and continued existence," the last of its six articles ran, "that we, like every country, should enjoy complete independence and liberty in the matter of assuring the means of our development, in order that our national and economic development should be rendered possible, and that it should be possible to conduct affairs in the form of a more up-to-date regular administration. For this reason we are opposed to restrictions inimical to our development in political, judicial, financial and other matters." In such a place and at such a time, the men who signed the document knew that they were risking their own liberties, if not their lives.

It was the signature of this historic document which loosed the Turkish revolution. The "unchanging East," which has been a byword for generations, produced the swiftest and most sensational succession of change which any nation has ever compressed into a single decade of its life. The fall of the Ottoman dynasty was only a detail, although that dynasty was the oldest in Europe—older than Hapsburgs, Romanoffs and Hohenzollerns whom the sultan-caliphs followed into obscurity. Achievement of territorial independence has proved to be no more than its preliminary task. Its more enduring interest lies in its domestic rather than in its foreign affairs, in the use to which it has turned the conquest of its homelands rather than in the qualities of tenacity and endurance which achieved that conquest. Even before its delegation left Angora for the peace conference of Lausanne, the revolution stacked its rifles and, in a country inconceivably devastated and impoverished, turned to the reconstruction of its domestic affairs with the feverish haste of a people who were centuries behind the times, and who knew from 200 years of steady defeat the fate which always overtakes the laggard.

Turkey has broken out of the strangling grip of theocracy and has taken a tremendous bound forward, leaving its old Ottoman impedimenta scattered by the roadside behind it. A disorderly débris of abandoned fezzes, kalpaks, veils and tchartchafs, Arabic script and lunar calendars now marks the scene of the Turkish revolution. Muezzins in derby hats cry the call to prayer, and women, looking without their veils much like Spanish women, vote in all municipal elections. The country has shed its medieval forms of Eastern theocratic government as hurriedly as if the plague were in them, and has made all possible speed to don modern forms of Western secular government. All capitulations have been abolished. All forms of religion, including Mohammedanism, have been disestablished. Dervish orders have been suppressed. Religious courts have been abolished, and with them the entire body of the Sheriat law which had been developed but never codified through centuries of varied interpretations of the Koran. In its place Western civil, criminal and commercial codes have been taken over en bloc from Switzerland, Italy and Germany, making polygamy illegal and marriage and divorce civil.

Religious schools have been abolished and the Ministry of Education, patterning its program on the French model, is building new schools and rebuilding old schools throughout the country for girls and boys alike. Every citizen between 16 and 45 is going to school to learn the Latin characters of the new Western left-to-right script. A whole new capital is being built, mostly after German architectural and town-planning ideas, out of the old mud-and-malarial provincial capital of Angora. Tithes have been abolished, brigandage has been largely stamped out, and every effort is being made to bring all forms of agriculture up to the high level of a few of its forms, such as Smyrna figs, Samsun tobacco and the new Adana cotton. The Ghazi Pasha is himself the owner of a huge model farm of 150,000 acres outside Angora. The same long-pent-up energy is building roads and laying down railroads, not as rapidly as it is moving education and agriculture forward but as rapidly as the budget permits.

There is no precedent anywhere in history for so overwhelming a revolution. No previous case exists in which a country has outlawed its own law and enacted an entire body of foreign law. No nation has ever before been conscripted and sent to school to learn a new alphabet. To date such a revolution from the signature of the national pact ten years ago is in one sense a rather arbitrary proceeding, for every aspect of the revolution is rooted far more deeply in the past than a mere decade. The signature of the pact, however, was the first occasion on which this present Turkish revolution broke surface. It was not until the Greek seizure of Smyrna in May, 1919, that Mustapha Kemal Pasha, now known as Ghazi, "the Conqueror," began creating the wholly new political force of out-and-out Turkish nationalism. The pact was no more than the Nationalist party's platform officially adopted by the Ottoman Chamber in Constantinople.

The present Turkish Government at Angora was at first no more than the Nationalist party in permanent session and its sole task was the carrying out of the pact. The Mudania armistice of October, 1922, and the Lausanne Peace Treaty of July, 1923, were the direct sequels of the pact. All the domestic achievement which the revolution has heaped up since the Greco-Turkish war ended in the armistice of Mudania, has been made by virtue of that independence which the pact demanded and eventually obtained. The Turkey of today is the product of the national pact of 1920 in the same sense as the United States of today is the product of the Declaration of Independence of 1776.

But although the date of the signature of the pact is the date from which the present Turkey traces its descent, another and a later date exists on which were removed some of the more serious obstacles which had wrecked previous Turkish attempts at revolution. In building up the new Nationalist party throughout the unoccupied interior of Asia Minor in the Summer of 1919 Kemal Pasha's aim was to compel the Ottoman Government in Constantinople to hold fresh elections and reopen Parliament. The new elections were held in the Autumn. Under the spur of a Greek Smyrna Asia Minor went solidly Nationalist. The Sultan opened the Parliament in Constantinople on Jan. 11, 1920. The national pact was circulated and signed on Jan. 28. It was adopted on Feb. 17. Then the blow fell.

NEW LIGHT SHED ON L'AIGLON

made recently both in reading French and in learning German arouses hope that it will be possible in a few months to begin German reading. By that time the Prince will have acquired a sufficient vocabulary and it is to be anticipated that at the completion of his seventh year he will be able to read and speak German fairly fluently and be able to express himself adequately in both languages, an unusual attainment with a child of his age.

"In order to attain this, however, the Prince must for the present be troubled with no other subject of instruction. The only exception to this must be religious instruction. A child of the Prince's character must be taught as early as possible that the background of this life is the future life; above all, that he must ever have before him the thought of the Creator's stern judgment. But as the Prince was unnecessarily worried when only 3 by having to learn the Catechism, this religious instruction must be given very gradually and confined to apparently chance references in the course of conversation. His thoughts have already been drawn steadily toward God and His supreme power, and the Bible has been given to him step by step.

WHEN reading aloud to the Prince, of which he is very fond, Collin will read him the Bible, while Foresti will make him acquainted with French literature in so far as it is suitable to a child. After many fruitless attempts, both teachers have hit upon a very good method for retaining the Prince's attention and one very suitable to his tender age and his disposition. It has been found that it is quite out of the question in his case to apply the affable methods which are usual with young children, for when the tutors have tried to do so and have seemed to abandon the dignity of the teacher, not only does the Prince immediately develop all sorts of malicious little attempts at insults but also a certain unruliness, and uses in his games such coarse expressions that it might be thought that he had been brought up not at court but among French soldiers.

"Admonitions having proved fruitless, the tutors have been obliged to alter their methods, while yet avoiding that harshness peculiar to so many teachers. We have given the Prince to understand that we are always rea ly to treat him kindly if he deserves it, and that he may enjoy every pleasure if he does not abuse our kindness, and I think that, while we at once made him keep a certain distance from us, he yet does not doubt that we really love him and try to do the best for him, even though his obstinacy sometimes obliges us to punish him. These punishments, however, are never for ordinary childish waywardnesses, but only when he shows obvious willfulness, chiefly at his lessons.

"Every lesson given to so young a child can only be regarded as a step in his training; it would therefore be almost cruel to punish him for not immediately evincing the hoped-for progress. In the Prince's case, it is important that that great obstinacy be broken which always induces him to do what he himself knows to be wrong. This is of such high importance to his future life that it would perhaps be salutary to punish him more severely. Such punishments as the tutors give him consist of putting him in a corner or depriving him of sweet dishes of which he is particularly fond.

"Owing to his obstinacy, it is obvious that it would be dangerous for the Prince to mix with other boys of his age. It would never be advisable to surround him with boys of far inferior station, such as Emile, for he would make them feel this in an unseemly manner. It would, however, be beneficial if he could play with one or two well-behaved children of aristocratic birth who only know German so that the Prince could learn that language in playing, but always under the most careful supervision. As soon as he has sufficient knowledge of German, he might then be permitted to play with boys knowing both French and German * * *

. "I think I can now conclude this report in the earnest hope that Y[our] M[ajesty] will approve of the mode of his education and training. Should Y[our] M[ajesty] find anything of which to disapprove, may I respectfully request Y[our] M[ajesty] for detailed instructions on any point to be altered.

"MORITZ, Count DIETRICHSTEIN."

The association between "l'Aiglon" and his principal tutor which thus began lasted until the former had passed his twentieth birthday and was no longer in need of a tutor. Long before Dietrichstein's work at Schönbrunn was ended, allied Europe had deprived his young pupil of the succession to Parma and his grandfather had given him in compensation the purely Austrian title of Duke of Reichstadt by which Napoleon's exiled son is best known to historians. Dietrichstein's official relations with him ended in 1831, when General Count Hartmann became adviser to the Duke.

A year after that, in 1832, when he was only 21 and at the beginning of what seemed likely to be a brilliant, if necessarily an acutely unhappy, career at his grandfather's court, the young Duke died at Schönbrunn.

In the second article of this series, which will appear in next Sunday's Times Magazine, the efforts of the Austrians to prevent any contact between l'Aiglon and the French are described.

NEW AGE ORGAN GRINDERS

HIGH-PRESSURE salesmanship has entered the organ-grinding industry. Venerable as it is—in years, at least—as a means of livelihood, it has been obliged to make innovations: it has been finding itself edged out of the picture of late, out-boomed by a radio loudspeaker in almost every lucrative business block and left without customers in the residential blocks, where the housewives have gone to business and the children are learning self-expression in kindergartens.

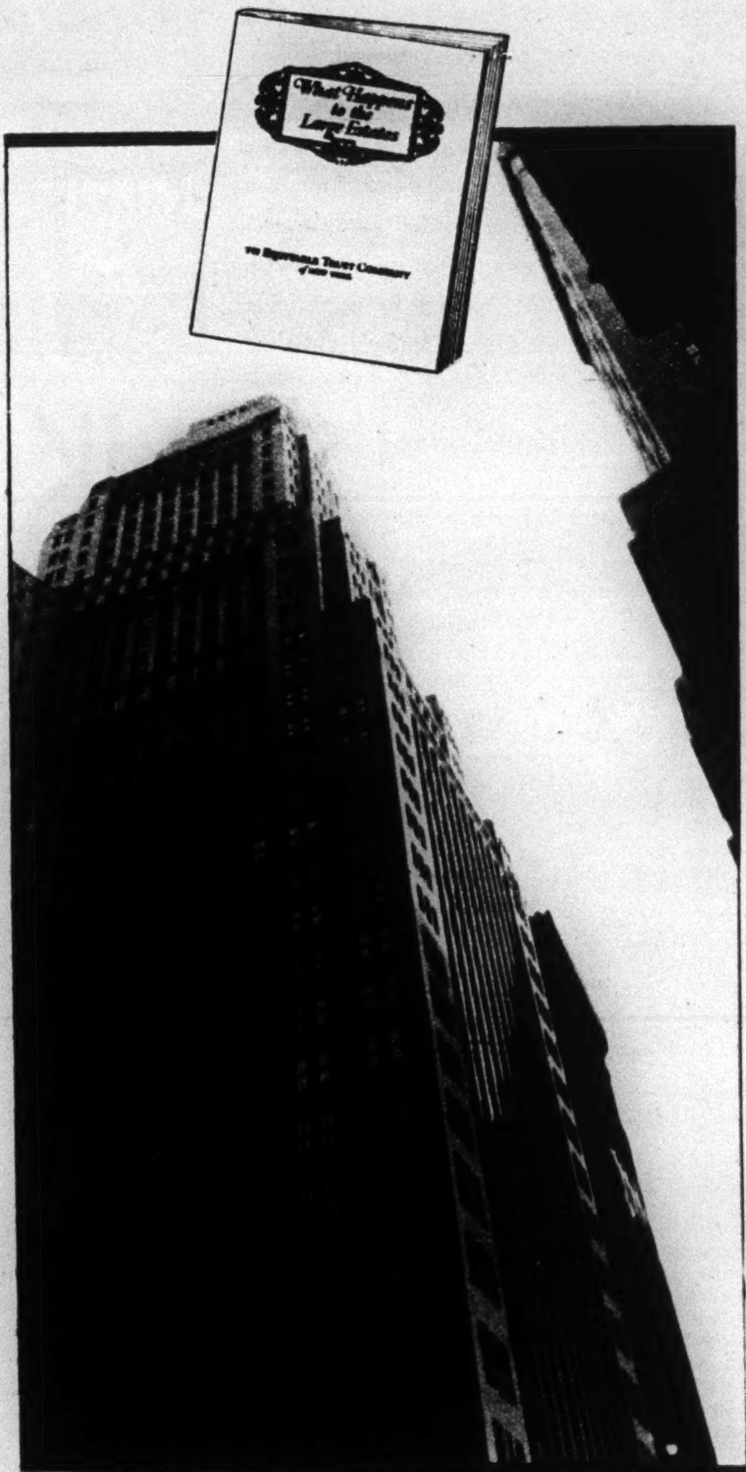
The latest plan of campaign is being demonstrated by a team. There is the same decrepit Italian to do the grinding, but instead of his wife, smiling and curtseying with winsome but—in these days—ineffectual grace, there is the son of the family, now grown to stalwart manhood, who has not spent long hours at Coney Island for nothing. He has added a third member, a parrot, who plays a large rôle, quietly and efficiently.

Instead of depending solely on the charms of the music, the young graduate of Coney Island counts on the music to make only the first impact in the selling appeal. A bystander quickly observes on the parrot's cage a sign announcing that for 5 cents any one may have his fortune told. The bird airs himself on his master's shoulder while the music is in progress. When a "prospect" appears he climbs down upon a stick in his master's hand and, thus induced to use his oracular powers, solemnly picks the appropriate fortune from a little drawer full of them, gives it to the customer and carries the nickel in his beak to a waiting pocket.

With this selling method the team is able to make good progress in the busy midtown areas of Manhattan where customers no longer feel impelled to pay for music purely for the cultural effect.

What happens to the large estates?

Average shrinkage in net assets over 25%



The Equitable's main building at 11 Broad Street, New York

THE Equitable has just completed a thorough analysis of estates recorded in the final accounting and transfer tax proceedings in New York County from January, 1926, to August, 1929. These estates ranged in size from $300,000 to over $10,000,000.

We found that the average shrinkage in net assets was over 25%.

The primary cause of this shrinkage was forced liquidation of valuable securities . . . forced liquidation because the estates did not include sufficient cash to meet administrative expenses.

"Administrative Expenses" include Federal Estate Taxes, New York State Transfer and Estate Taxes, unpaid Income Taxes, outstanding debts and general administrative costs.

Cash to cover these expenses could have been provided by our plan, which enables the estate owner to transfer his estate 100% intact to his beneficiaries.

No estate owner wants to have the gains of his last few years gobbled up by Administrative Expenses when a simple, satisfactory solution of a problem almost as inevitable as the taxes themselves can be had through The Equitable's plan.

Our new booklet, "What Happens to the Large Estates," points out many interesting findings which any estate owner will be glad to know. Send for your copy today.

in Angora, where for nearly a month afterward they kept trickling in, some of them mounted on donkeys and clad in top hats and frock coats. The allies in Constantinople continued to hold the Ottoman Sultan-Caliph, but their suppression of his Parliament reduced his authority to a shadow. The remnants of the suppressed Parliament eventually reached Angora and were re-formed there into the Grand National Assembly of Turkey, whose first session Kemal Pasha opened on April 23 in the one-story granite building at the foot of the hill. "The Ottoman empire is dead! Long live Turkey!"

It was that night of March 15-16, 1920, which removed some of the more serious obstacles to Turkish revolution. There were no allied forces in the interior of Asia Minor to deny independence to the new Nationalist Government which hurriedly grew up around the assembly at Angora. Large areas of what it regarded as its homeland were under allied and Greek occupation, but the new government at Angora had a large enough area of its own in which to remobilize, re-equip and re-munition its armies. It was ringed round with the Allies and the Greeks to north, south, east and west; and Constantinople, the only enemy capital which the Allies had occupied, had sunk to such a condition that its future was sometimes said to be a medical rather than a political problem.

WOEFULLY undermanned and with some of its best brains interned on Malta, the hastily extemporized government at Angora necessarily put its whole strength into its War Office and its Foreign Office. Fevzi Pasha, who recreated its armies, had 19,000 men to begin with. Inside a year he increased them to 200,000, and had a constant stream of munitions pouring up from the seaports and from his own arsenals in the interior. The Foreign Office had an old table, a bottle of ink and a pen to begin with. When the first Foreign Minister fell, the government kidnapped a successor from a mission which had been sent to Angora from Constantinople. His name was Yusuf Kémal Bey, and in normal life he was a professor at the Turkish University in Constantinople, one of the same cloistered tribe as Wilson and Masaryk. But that did not prevent him from driving a hard bargain with Tchitcherin, and another later on with Franklin-Bouillon.

Meanwhile a situation had come about which had no opportunity to reveal itself until after the fighting was over and Ismet Pasha was on his way to meet the Allies at Lausanne with the national pact in his pocket. The first ray of peace which struck down through the military secrecy of Asia Minor, revealed the squalor which to this day forms the background of the Turkish revolution. Some of the Turks who escaped to Angora on the night of March 15-16 were Europeans who knew Paris and Berlin as well as they knew Constantinople, but who had never known their own country beyond the Bosporus until the Allies exiled them into it and who to this day have never recovered from the shock it gave them.

Under the old Ottoman Government Grand Constantinople sucked a considerable part of its revenues, its food and its army from Asia Minor and counted its duty done. No recent Sultan has ever toured his Anatolian provinces. Down to the end of the war, Kemal Pasha himself, a Macedonian Turk and in every respect a European, had known Asia Minor chiefly as a campaigning ground, and what was any senior Turkish officer of his type to think of a country so primitive that during the war its armies took thirty-eight days to bring up supplies from Ulukishla to the Russian front?

Conditions were and are as bad in the Balkan countries, but no Balkan people has had within modern times the governing status of the Turk. The European Turks who fled from the capital on the night of March 15-16 found in Asia Minor a population decimated by casualties, disease and the forced migrations of repeated wars—a weight of accumulated disaster which made every isolated village suspicious of its neighbor; a state of habitual insecurity which made every village snuff out its lights and vanish into the night whenever the barking of its dogs indicated the approach of strangers; and communications which consisted for the most part of roads on which Turkish carriage drivers shouted to their floundering horses that all else in the universe was lies, that only this bottomless mud was reality.

In such a country Turks of the better classes, accustomed to the amenities of Constantinople, could not live. One of two things was bound to happen as soon as the fighting ended. Either the vast stagnation of the interior would eventually pull down such men to its own primitive level, or in the end such men would lift the neglected interior to a higher and more European level of civilization. This was the conflict which was precipitated by the night of March 15-16 and in this conflict lay the seeds of an inevitable revolution.

ONCE the fighting had ended, the entire story of the revolution and all its accomplishment becomes the story of a single-minded grappling with the squalor of Asia Minor—a squalor inherited from the complete wreck of a long past and greatly worsened in places by the large devastated areas which the fighting left in its wake. Appalling as conditions were when the Allies exiled the Nationalists to the interior, two years later when the fighting ended, there were large and potentially rich areas in the East, the South and the West in which hardly a street cat remained alive among the charred walls and the ruined fields.

Such was the situation in which Mustapha Kemal Pasha turned his country round as soon as the fighting ended and faced it toward the overwhelming tasks of reconstruction which awaited it from end to end of its new frontiers. Even before Ismet Pasha had signed peace at Lausanne, the Ghazi Pasha assembled his country's first economic congress at Smyrna and in his opening address told the 500 delegates: "Gentlemen, those who effect conquests by the sword finish by being beaten by those who employ as their weapon the plow, and by ceding their place to them. In the struggle between the sword and the plow, it is always the plow which comes out on top."

His audience belonged to a nation of soldiers. The Ghazi himself had always been a soldier, but lifelong habits of study and observation had given him a wonderful grasp of European politics and a clear conception of what his backward country required if it was to retain its place in the European family in this twentieth century. Added to this he had sheer force of personality which made his nation regard him with something very much like awe. There is a certain provincial Governor in Asia Minor today who was a famous and wealthy brigand under the old Ottoman régime and who, when Kemal Pasha first went to see him in 1919 was more than suspicious of his visitor. But in that visit, for the first time in his life, the ex-brigand met his master. "I could not even look him in the eye," he said afterward.

One other element in the development of the revolution remains to be noted if the main aspects of the Turkey of today are to be seen in correct focus. "The new Turkish régime rejects in their entirety the old superannuated methods of government," the Ghazi Pasha once said in one of his addresses to the Assembly in Angora. "The common bond which unites the national elements and insures their permanence has abandoned its religious character and has taken on a national form. As a result of the revolution and the modifications which have taken place in its national life the country has been inspired with the needs of the present age, and it regards as the single factor of existence a laic mentality capable of perfecting itself in proportion to the advance of our social evolution."

For a time a single historic Moslem inheritance prevented the complete secularization of the new State. It was easy enough to adopt republican forms of government in October, 1923, after the Allies had evacuated Constantinople and the Sultan had left with them, but it was not so easy to abolish the Caliphate, to which the government at Angora had elected the Sultan's heir, Abdul Mejid. It was the Caliphate which made the old Ottoman Government the champion of Islam, a rôle which was heavily expensive to it and which, if retained, would have been a heavy and somewhat incongruous expense to the new and otherwise secularized republic.

Its retention was brief. It was abolished in March, 1924, and the effect of its abolition has been to remove the last lingering temptation to those foreign adventures which played so large a part in draining away the strength of the old empire. The Turkey of today continues to keep its powder dry. Its ruling triumvirate still consists of the Ghazi Pasha, its President; Ismet Pasha, its Prime Minister, and Fevzi Pasha, the Chief of its General Staff. The largest items in its budget continue to be devoted to its army, navy, police and gen-

JOVIAL TOBY IS BACK AGAIN

He Graces the Mantel Along With Other Little Figures of the Staffordshire Potter's Art

IT was a blessed grandmother who took the cherished pottery figures she knew as Staffordshire and, when they went out of style, wrapped them carefully for safe-keeping in the attic, instead of discarding them. Her heirs have precious treasures now, for the Staffordshire dog and cat, man and maid are all having their day again. Fashion, however, does not have to wait on attic and antique shop. The department stores, too, have added gay, quaintly colorful "image toys and chimney ornaments," as the potters themselves dubbed their wares.

The antiques, to be sure, are held more desirable than modern pieces, and far more valuable, but the others serve their purpose; for in certain styles of home decorating the presence of a preternaturally curly white spaniel, stolidly posted beside the grate, and a jovial Toby jug on the mantel have come to be looked upon as indispensable as the hooked rug before the hearth. Since forward-looking grandmothers were not nearly numerous enough, homemakers with a feeling for that particular atmosphere of the past might be in a quandary were not a whole new generation of Staffordshire figures rapidly springing into being. Some of them come from England as did the originals, some are from Italy and some are fabricated in America, but all conform to patterns 100 years or more old. Whatever their source, they exhale the Staffordshire spirit and carry on the Staffordshire tradition, and wherever they put in their characteristic appearance, they arouse new interest in the story of their origins.

THESE "image toys and chimney ornaments" never pretended to be really fine art. Originally they were the craft of peasant potters and were made for peasants. For the castles of noblemen and the halls of squires there were porcelains wrought with elegance and finish. These pottery figures were intended for no more than a note of cheerfulness in a farmer's house or a laborer's cottage. They express the peasant mind, reflecting his everyday life and rarely the peasant sense of humor. These bright little bits of salt glaze ware were sold in quantities by the rustics at their local fairs. No abode was complete without a pair of woolly looking, staring dogs to command the ends of the mantelpiece. In the centre there was usually an elaborate, castellated structure to hold the watch or clock. The dresser had to have its spotted cow jugs for milk and cream; and somewhere about the place would be old Toby, in some form or other, with his tricorn hat forming a spout for whatever beverage he held.

Reproduction Staffordshire figures stick to a few particularly popular subjects, insufficient to give much idea of the range of the old-time potters' fancy. But museums and private collections show that the original makers took a wide variety of models. Many of their pieces, like the curly dogs, were purely ornamental; but as many others were useful things molded in highly ornamental form. Birds and animals and people were made to serve the purpose of teapots, jugs, money boxes, candlesticks, salt shakers and whistles.

The early examples of the ware are rude figures decorated with lines, splotches and splashes of slip, trailed on while the piece was still soft through a quill or from a narrow-spouted vessel. Later, more skillful effects were achieved, and the forms became more elaborate. Much of the animal kingdom is represented. There are archaic looking cats and kinky lambs, tawny lions and horses with riders, bull-baiting and a stag leaping before a hollow stump that serves either as a candlestick or a vase. Teapots were fashioned in the form of a kneeling camel or a ship. There was a bear jug, whose head may be removed to be used as a cup. One elephant jug bears a castle on its back with a monkey as the knob of the cover and twined snakes for the handles. Another jug shows Bacchus seated on a cask holding a cornucopia with an emerging dolphin for a spout; the monkey resting on the god's shoulder forms the handle.

The popular Toby jug had its inspiration, it is said, in an engraving of Toby Philpot, or Fillpot, "a thirsty old soul as e'er drank a bottle or fathomed a bowl." He was the subject of a song, "The Brown Jug," published in 1761. The faces of many of the figures, such as the dainty little shepherdess with her sheep and the shepherd with his dog, are reputed to have been modeled after real people. One of the potters, John Ridgway, is known to have used himself and his wife as models for his inkwells, which represent a human head with an open mouthful of ink. The reason these are so scarce, it is said, is that descendants of the Ridgeways, finding the caricatures too good, once bought up all they could discover and destroyed them.

The later Staffordshire potters indulged in considerable portraiture, presenting historical events also and copying many of the monuments in Westminster Abbey. They also turned out many busts of famous personages. The influence of Methodism in the neighborhood was indicated by the prevalence of Whitfields and Westleys done in pottery.

Toward the middle of the nineteenth century it became the fashion for other local events than the visits of notables to be recorded in "image toys and chimney ornaments." The potters, for instance, did tabloid service in their day by illustrating the notorious Rush murders. The case concerned a farmer by the name of Rush who murdered his landlord and several members of his family, and apprehended through the aid of his sweetheart, was hanged before Norwich Castle. The intense interest stirred up by the trial was capitalized by local potters in reproductions of the places and personages involved in the affair, and thereafter on many a chimney piece of the neighborhood Rush and his sweetheart long stood, silently accusing each other in the grim shadow of a miniature Norwich Castle.

REVIVAL OF WHISKERS SOUGHT IN FRANCE.

A WELL-KNOWN arbiter elegantiarum of the Parisian boulevards, according to press reports, has started a campaign for the return of the beard, blaming the American safety razor for beardlessness. To him the beard is "the outward sign of a mature mind." His campaign appears to be the beginning of a trade war; history tells of real wars begun because of or influenced by beards.

The Tartars waged a long war with the Persians, declaring them infidels because they would not cut their beards after the custom of Tartary. The Greeks wore their beards until the time of Alexander the Great, who ordered the Macedonians to be shaved lest the beard should "give a handle" to their enemies. The huge monuments of the Assyrians show the conquering armies full-bearded and only the slaves and captives shaven. Dionysus, having many enemies and fearing for his life, forbade his barber to use a razor on him, and, legend has it, his face was "shaved" with a hot iron. Later it was the Norman conquerors who were clean-chinned and the bearded barbarians who were the conquered.

"What I know about nice women"

LISTEN to a doctor whose practice includes hundreds of the better class. "It is simply unbelievable," he says, "how many women—supposedly nice, fastidious women—are suffering from halitosis and utterly ignorant of the fact. No wonder their husbands hesitate to kiss them, or that women friends avoid them."

Don't fool yourself

Be the first to suspect yourself of having halitosis (bad breath). So many everyday conditions cause it that it is folly for any one to assume complete freedom from it. Defective teeth for example. Fermenting food particles. Pyorrhea. Germ infections of the mouth. Keep yourself on the popular side by gargling with full strength Listerine morning and night, and before meeting others. Listerine instantly ends halitosis.

Destroys odors—kills germs

Being a safe germicide so active it kills even Staphylococcus Aureus (pus) and Bacillus Typhosus (typhoid) germs in 15 seconds, it naturally combats germ conditions which cause odors. Then, being a powerful deodorant, it destroys the odors themselves.

INTO THE ABODE OF GNOMES AND FAIRIES

A Visit to the Volcanic Wonderland That King Albert Has Set Aside in Africa as a Sanctuary for Game

By MARY L. JOBE AKELEY

IN the most primitive spot in all Africa and near the continent's geographic centre is the Parc National Albert of the Belgian Congo. Created by Albert, King of the Belgians, in 1925, four years after the searchlight of interest had been turned upon this almost unknown region by Carl Akeley, it became a sanctuary for all wild life—plant and animal. Today, enlarged tenfold, its 500,000 acres border two great equatorial lakes—Lake Edward and Lake Kivu. Its vast plains and valleys are watered by deep tropic rivers. Its uplands reach their ultimate peaks in the smoke masses of active volcanoes, desolate of life from jagged rampart to molten crater, or in the clouds of their ancient sisters—for long ages extinct and now pulsating with life from rolling green foothill along densely forested massif to snowy summit. Carl Akeley called this ancient volcanic wonderland the "abode of the gnomes and fairies." He believed it the most beautiful spot in all the world.

The centre of life interest in the Parc is the triangle composed of the three old volcanoes, Mikeno, Karisimbi and Bishoke. Here, from the palm-fringed equatorial rivers which skirt their base to flower-filled alpine heights, are all the zones of climate of the earth. Here throughout recent ages have been born the very offspring of Flora and Faunus. In the midst of rich, varied and almost unreal vegetation is the home of many mammals, small and great. Elephants break out wide, deep trails as they travel along the mountain slopes. Herds of buffalo leave a narrower track as they forage between lower forest and alplands.

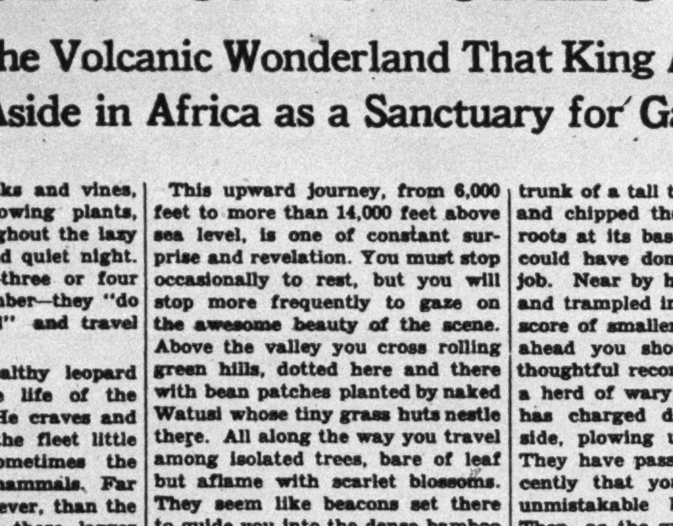
Ranging side by side with elephant and buffalo are strange manlike apes—the gorillas. Feasting on the sweet, succulent shoots of young bamboo in the lower altitudes, or on the tender hearts and roots of lush, tall-growing wild celery of the upper reaches, they leave a trail both wide and long. Their camp grounds are unmistakable, for there they fashion basket-like beds of dry sticks and vines, or sometimes of growing plants, and they sleep throughout the lazy afternoon or long and quiet night. Usually in families—three or four to twenty-five in number—they "do themselves very well" and travel leisurely.

Here, too, the stealthy leopard lurks, menacing the life of the "unfit to persist." He craves and often brings down the fleet little red duiker and sometimes the young of the large mammals. Far more numerous, however, than the occasional voices of these larger forest denizens are the cries and songs of many birds whose swift and brilliant wings brighten ever and anon the great dim jungle.

If you are light of heel and strong in heart and lungs you can climb in two days up through this wonderland from tropic lowland to wind-harried mountain summit. But you can make this journey in so short a time only if the native with his sickle-shaped, hand-wrought axe has gone ahead to cut out some vaguely defined track, for this region has rarely suffered the intrusion of man, black or white. So quickly does the rank-growing vegetation obliterate a man-made trail that it is hard to read the record of those who may have traveled that way even a few months before. This is one of nature's lavish gifts—a rare and re-creative endowment of the wilds.

This upward journey, from 6,000 feet to more than 14,000 feet above sea level, is one of constant surprise and revelation. You must stop occasionally to rest, but you will stop more frequently to gaze on the awesome beauty of the scene. Above the valley you cross rolling green hills, dotted here and there with bean patches planted by naked Watusi whose tiny grass huts nestle there. All along the way you travel among isolated trees, bare of leaf but aflame with scarlet blossoms. They seem like beacons set there to guide you into the dense bamboo forest a little further on.

In the bamboos, so thick growing and so high that you suddenly find yourself enveloped in twilight, you stumble in an elephant trail made only a few hours before, crossing old ones furrowed out a year ago. Right in front of you the old tusker has barked off and corrugated the trunk of a tall tree and has hacked and chipped the heavy, buttressed roots at its base. No gigantic axe could have done a more effective job. Near by he has broken down and trampled into kindling wood a score of smaller trees. A few rods ahead you should take time for thoughtful reconnoissance, for here a herd of wary, dangerous buffalo has charged down the mountain side, plowing up the wet humus. They have passed that way so recently that you can detect their unmistakable barn-yard scent. Then, as the greatest thrill of all, you may easily come upon clumps of bamboos twisted and torn and pulled up by the roots—the pinkish-grayish-green shoots eaten and the tough canes discarded—where a band of hungry gorillas has taken a morning meal.



"The Old Man of Mikeno."

You will think you have reached Carl Akeley's "fairyland" at last; but, as he told me on our journey, "You have only a glimpse of it here; we must go on higher up to see it at its best." And you will go on. You will climb along a hog-back between two deep gullies, with a sheer drop of 1,000 feet in many places, along the brink of a deep canyon, down which courses a sprightly stream, spilling itself in a high waterfall to an abrupt and deeper chasm below. At this vantage point, beyond and between columns of beautiful trees and in one of the few outlooks in the great Kivu forest, you will see the steam-capped summit of active Nyamlagira, twenty miles across the lava plains below.

Here in a small natural clearing you will doubtless pitch your little green linen tents for the night. Your naked porters will crouch over tiny bamboo fires, in improvised shelters of sticks and vines under the overhanging trees. You will not sleep too soon, because you will be hindered and enthralled by the noises of the night: by the squawking of jungle fowl that roost near by; by the faint night songs of many birds that gather in the trees overhead; by the eerie voice of a native porter as he cries out in some troubled dream, or by the weirdest sound of all, the cry of the tree hyrax, wholly indescribable and like nothing else you have ever heard. You will rest finally and will be lured to slumber by the comforting singing of little "peeper frogs" and, as you touch the borderland of dreams, you will be sure your tent is pitched by some little pond at Springtime in the homeland.

IN the morning you will waken to the patter of heavy rain on your tent; but in an hour or so the sun will blaze out; fleecy cumulus clouds will drive across the heavens, revealing a clear blue vault; and, outstanding 5,000 feet above you, you will see a fresh and heavy snowfall on the domelike summit of Karisimbi. Five thousand feet below, you will glimpse the blue sheet of Lake Kivu, dotted with green islands.

Soon you will take the upward track through the rain-soaked woodland. Leaving the bamboos behind, you plunge into the "cold forest." You will now need your warm woolen clothing, for the climate is chill indeed. It has become that of the north temperate zone in early Spring. Three thousand feet above your night's camp, you will reach the scene which Carl Akeley chose as the background for his gorilla group and considered the most impressively beautiful in Africa. It was for the painting of

AN EMPIRE IN THE HARBOR

Governors Island, Oblivious of New York, Keeps Military Traditions of Three Centuries

By ARTHUR H. RICHTER

GOVERNORS ISLAND, that little, self-contained world lying off the Battery where the North and East Rivers meet in a tide-rip, is undergoing a striking transformation. A new barracks, one of the longest buildings ever constructed, is rising on that part of the island which was built with material taken from New York's first subway excavation. One by one the old wooden war shacks, eye-sores since they were constructed, are coming down. Even now, between the shacks, one catches a glimpse of the polo field, that will become an emerald carpet in the Spring. Presently the barracks will be completed, the shacks will have disappeared and a remodeled park will emerge. But although Governors Island will be changed physically, its placid life will go on as usual, and it will remain an isolated kingdom with which few civilians become familiar.

Although almost under the shadow of lower Manhattan's towering stone pillars, Governors Island goes its own pace, makes its own laws and asks few favors of its powerful neighbor. It is true that three of the necessities of life—food, fuel and water—must be supplied from the mainland, but otherwise the island is independent and aloof. The sole means of communication with the outside world are the telephone and ferry. For many years all sorts of antiquated ferryboats plied over the short stretch of water, but recently a modern all-steel ferry has been placed in service.

Few towns or countries can boast more complete facilities for comfort and maintenance than Governors Island. Few kingdoms, perhaps, can produce a more logical claim to independence than the little plot in the upper bay. It has its own social life, its own recreations, its own laws. It even has its own currency—canteen checks that are legal tender at the Post Exchange, and are issued as pay to its soldier population.

In contrast with the giant democracy across the bay, Governors Island is a tiny monarchy in which an autocrat holds sway. The ruler without royal robes is the commanding officer of the Second Corps Area—at present, Major Gen. Hanson E. Ely. His courtiers are his staff of officers; the men stationed there, with their families, form the sturdy peasantry.

Trial by jury and other forms of democratic government are unknown in this independent community; it has no need of municipal police. Military law prevails. Courts-martial do all sentencing of law breakers. The island even has its own prison—historic Castle Williams, built as a fort in 1807, serving in that capacity.

IN addition to its military police, the island boasts a fire department, a little band of soldier "smoke-eaters" equal in strength and equipment to that of any medium-sized town. Its water supply for this purpose is unlimited. Unless a fire assumes proportions of unusual size, the island's apparatus handles it. In cases of emergency, Brooklyn or Manhattan apparatus is ready to step in and lend aid. The fire-alarm box system on the island is patterned after the elaborate New York signals.

One might suppose that life in this military post would be dull and drab; that stern duty and rigid routine would usurp the place of gay social affairs. The contrary is true; the island has an enviable reputation for successful entertaining.

Although the Governors Island soldier has a tiny domain, he does not have to travel to an outlying district to find sport and recreation. His country club is the island itself, and well equipped it is. The islander can play football, baseball, basketball, polo, golf and tennis, or he can even run on the track. Intramural contests are held and arouse much interest.

The officers on the island have taken up polo quite seriously, and have organized several teams in addition to the one that represents the post in Army competition. The polo field is splendid, and its setting is unusual and picturesque. One sees the ponies dashing over the green; one hears the voices of the players urging them on and the sharp click of the mallet against the ball—all this against a background of open water with many-storied skyscrapers beyond.

In furthering its claim to being a complete little world and in rounding out its athletic life, Governors Island can exhibit tennis courts and a golf course that is really unique and might almost be considered one of the wonders of the island. Those who play a round on this course for the first time need a guide to show them the way, for hazards unknown to most golfers—even in nightmares—are there. One after another of these weird obstacles jump out at the golfer who, accustomed as he may be to playing close to par on any course near the city, will find it almost impossible to come close to that mark on this 1,878-yard, nine-hole course.

DIFFICULTY in concentrating on the task on hand besets the golfer. As he prepares to drive, there come into view cannon that were used a hundred years ago; a fort, built by students and professors as a protection to the port; the residence of the Major General, master of the tiny domain; and a sallyport carved by a doomed man. On teeing off for a hole, the player finds himself confronted by a building which must be hurdled on the way to the next green and his only guide is an arrow painted on the wall. It is a blind hole. At another place the player must just graze the side of old Fort Columbus or the ball will go into the moat to make plenty of trouble. Again, a drive must go past the quarters of the non-commissioned officers and their families.

Usually it is with a feeling of great relief that one finishes his first nine holes on this hazardous course, but after a few rounds the very difficulty of the game becomes fascinating.

Like any self-contained community, the island has its own churches and a school. There is the Chapel of St. Cornelius the Centurion, a branch of Trinity Church, containing many battle flags and relics. There is also a Roman Catholic Church, a branch of the Mission of Our Lady of the Rosary. The school is under direction of the Board of Education, and about 100 pupils attend.

While the trade and commerce of Governors Island is dwarfed by that on most blocks of the city, nevertheless, it is sufficient to keep the inhabitants from depending on shops on the mainland. There are a tailor shop, a laundry, a post-office and what is believed to be the smallest gasoline station in the city. The island has two publications. Foodstuffs and fuel are brought over on the ferry.

But with all this completeness, all these facilities for comfortable living, there has always been one sad deficiency on Governors Island. Officers and men have lived in shacks made of old corrugated iron and green wood, under roofs with yawning cracks which let in the rain. This will be changed when the new building of red brick and limestone, 1,000 feet long, is completed to give the island one of the finest and most beautiful army barracks in the United States.

ONE WAY AHEAD

STUDY is the backlog of progress. It is in many ways a guarantee of advancement. While study cannot by itself assure success, it helps immeasurably toward success . . . The rise of personal fortunes and of national fortunes is largely the result of study, and its practical application toward specific problems. Each year a greater number of intelligent men and women devote spare time to it. Economic theories, scientific axioms, philosophical beliefs, prejudices, all are constantly being changed by study. . . . In times of depression, the real power and the intrinsic worth of trained minds are recognized and well repaid . . . Whether your objective be progress in business, in social or in civic life its attainment can be made easier by carefully selected studies under proper guidance.

MODERN LIGHTING EFFECTS

occasions. It is interesting to note how the artist has been able to harmonize his paintings, which are contemporary rather than ultra-modern in style, with the decidedly modernistic treatment of the architectural details of the other parts of the walls and of the ceiling.

The magic of color employed in wall decoration, even without the aid of pictorial murals, is illustrated in a hotel recently renovated. At the Hotel Berkley the architect and decorator, Winold Reiss, has transformed the lobby, lounge and dining room by eliminating the heavy ornamentation of the past and, through simplicity of detail and bright hues, has created a smart air in terms of today.

The small lobby of this apartment hotel has deep rose and orange hues and a dull gold ceiling. The walls of the lounge, which opens out of the lobby, are also in dull gold with a rose color carpet and a lighter shade of the same color showing in the upholstery of the modern furniture. In the dining room a blue-green presents a cool and restful contrast to the other interiors. A touch of gilt on the wainscoting harmonizes with the use of gilt on the ceiling where the beams, once concealed, are now incorporated into the decorative ensemble. Hanging lights have the electric bulbs hidden amid the vertical sheets of opaque white glass of the modern chandeliers. Large and many-sectioned mirrors occupy much of the wall space on three sides of the room, enlarging it in a contemporary version of the ancient Venetian mode.

In addition to those hotels which dramatize color in their interior decoration, there are others that reflect the best decorative effects of the past. English periods ranging from the early Tudor styles to late Georgian present opportunity for furnishings and especially for wall treatments that provide the quiet charm that appeals to many. Although the Tudor period, which harks back to the sixteenth century, was really not such a comfortable time in which to live, judged by the uupholstery and steam-heated standards of today, modern hotels, basing their decorative schemes on the romantic past, give much more picturesque and certainly more comfortable rooms than even Queen Elizabeth possessed. Stone walls and beamed ceilings are decorative motifs of the lobby of the Hotel Lexington, a recently built residential hotel. A dramatized interpretation of the past is here achieved with all the picturesque beauty of the period but without any of the drawbacks to comfort of the actual houses and furnishings of early days.

An example of a later English period, when luxury was much more attainable, is shown in the Hotel Montclair with its lobby of walnut-paneled walls illuminated by subdued light from wall fixtures modeled on the candle-holders of the time. Eighteenth century styles of settees and chairs further carry out the effect in a metropolitan hostelry of the quietude of an old London mansion—a deliberately sought-for contrast with the hectic life of the workaday world just outside the hotel doors.

ALLIED to the decoration of public places are the interiors of candy shops and lunch rooms which have lately developed the decorative element as an important business asset. In some of those recently opened this recognition of the value of individuality is achieved. Some achieve it through emphasis on contrast of materials; others seek in the refinement of forms of counters and show cases and interior architecture for the modern air of distinction. Color is a factor also, but in some of the most successful of these interiors sophisticated art makes color serve instead of dominate, as it occasionally did in earlier examples.

The decorative possibilities of the various materials employed in lunch and soda bars, such as metal, marble, porcelain and glass, offer wide opportunities to the modern designer. Part of his creed is to bring out the distinctive decorative possibilities of every material he employs rather than make it attractive by adding ornamentation. Thus in the counter in a recently opened Loft candy store on upper Broadway, shining silver metal coffee urns, fruit bowls and other necessary utensils are effectively contrasted with the simple black marble top of the counter and its lighter stone front. The leather seats of the iron revolving counter chairs bring another texture into the picture. Diamond-shaped mirrors hung against a wall painted in pastel shades are made more prominent as objects of glass by being left unframed. Instead of long, orderly placed shelves on the wall back of the counter, a step-up arrangement is employed. Grilles over the ventilating openings, high on the walls, were designed to carry out the right-angle motif in the fixtures.

THE modernness of the decorative details of the interior, which was designed by the architects, Thompson & Churchill, is strongly suggested on the exterior of the shop. A front of black glass has accents of white glass which at night become sources of illumination. Where metal is used, modern chromium plate is employed instead of the painted iron of the past.

A grill lunch room in this shop called on the painter to place a modern mural on the ceiling. By its lines and perspective the observer receives a view of the city at an unusual angle—one might cal it a pedestrian's eye view of the metropolis. This cleverly gave added height to a rather low ceiling. Not only is the skyscraper pictured but the steel girders which, while construction is going on, are almost as much a part of the city landscape as the completed buildings, are also suggested. Traffic policemen, automobiles and airplanes are also depicted with artistic license. Developed in brown and silver, the color scheme of the mural catches up the tones employed on the walls.

A smaller shop, but an admirable example of the present tendency to decorate as much through materials and functional form as through obvious ornamentation, is the candy and gift shop of Emma Bruns, where space had to be conserved while a smart effect was achieved. Interest was developed through careful refinement of the forms of show cases and the wall space. Also the pillars, ceiling beams and pipes which interiors in modern structures reveal when several rooms are thrown into one, as was the case here, were by careful planning integrated into the decorative ensemble. The fine grain of the brown woodwork, the silver metal fixtures and the glass fronts of the cases all offered opportunities to the interior architect, Jo Brandes, for decorative notes. With the exception of the tan color of the walls, the hues of the wood and metal were the only chromatic touches in the interior. These provided a neutral setting against which the varied and brightly colored merchandise produced a maximum of effect.

The illumination fixtures—concealed lights under white opaque glass—permitted another decorative note in the modern manner as well as providing adequate lighting for each show case and the interior of the shop. Thus the old-time chandelier with its period ornamentation is eliminated in the modern decorative scheme. Illumination sources in this instance are level with the ceiling or the top of the show cases, with the exception of an oblong lighting source that forms an ornamental accent on the front of one show case.

HEAVY PENALTIES await jewel smugglers

SMUGGLING jewelry is dangerous. Rewards for information are large. Penalties are heavy.

Under the Tariff Act of 1922 25 per cent. of the net amount recovered by the Government, but not over $50,000 in any case, may be awarded and paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to any person who furnishes original information which leads to the "recovery of any duties withheld, or any fine, penalty or forfeiture incurred."

The Government can seize jewelry years after it has been smuggled, so that a temporary success at the time of arrival is no security.

Information relating to the smuggling of jewelry may be sent by letter, cable or wireless to this office. The name of the informer will not be divulged even to Government officials. The information will be filed in the name of this Association, and the full reward received from the Government paid to the informer.

A NEW DECORATIVE MODE IN OUR HOTELS

Public Rooms Employ Light as an Aid in Modern Mural Effects

Lighting Effects in a New Hotel Dining Room.

By WALTER RENDELL STOREY.

FEW types of interiors today reveal such eclectic taste in decoration, especially of walls, as do the public rooms of hotels—lobbies, dining rooms and ballrooms. Recently opened New York hotels disclose interiors that range from the newest idea—that of decoration by light—to huge murals, as well as other wall treatments. Some interiors are modernistic; some are inspired by traditional periods which carry with them the romantic glamour of Tudor castles or London mansions. Thus the field is divided between decorations that dramatize the vigor and color of the twentieth century and those that emulate the rich charm of an earlier and more peaceful age.

While some of the recently completed hotels show more of the painter's art than has of late been employed, it is the illuminating engineer working with the artist who has evolved a lusty competitor to the traditional painted wall, molded cornice and gilded statues with which ballrooms and banquet halls of hotels were so long adorned. With the large ballroom of the St. George Hotel as a background, a daring innovation has just been developed in which electric light has been employed to do what the older forms of decoration once accomplished.

Entering the room one observes that the walls and balcony fronts are painted a flat white and are devoid of any applied ornamentation. But the illuminating engineer has made it possible to flood the interior in a moment with the light from thousands of concealed electric bulbs, covering the walls and ceiling with beautiful hues and patterns. To Winold Reiss, interior architect and designer of the room, and F. J. Cadenas, illuminating engineer, is jointly credited the working out of this revolutionary application of decorative lighting to interiors.

By concealing the lamps behind vari-shaped flutes or small screens of sheet metal, both soft light and shadows may be enlisted to aid in creating the effects. Bands of these flutes form friezes along the fronts of the balconies, below the cornices of the room, and they also border the transverse rectangular recesses in the flat ceiling. These provide the architectural background for the illumination. Along the wall back of a platform at one end of the hall other lights are arranged to flare upward against the wall in an aurora borealis effect. The absence of windows in the hall makes the lighting effect appropriate in the daytime as well as at night.

The various groups of lights as well as the different colors are controlled separately through an elaborate switchboard. Variations and combinations of color and design, as with a kaleidoscope, are innumerable. Consistency of decoration with the occasion is now easily possible. For a patriotic rally the hues may typify the colors of the flag; on St. Patrick's Day the hall may be a symphony in green; for a solemn meeting purples and lavenders and deep rich colors may predominate.

ON festive occasions the color scheme may provide, if it is desired, a changing and moving type of decoration of which there is no equivalent in static ornamentation. In a private demonstration inaugurating the new method of decoration recently before members of the Illuminating Engineering Society, a slow, continued merging of one effect into another was obtained. Even active motion consisting of waves of light and odd contrasts of color may be provided for those who would have jazz effects. Possibilities of synchronization of the changes in lighting with the music of the orchestra are suggested. Ethereal shades of a moonlit garden, the brilliant hues of sunsets, or startling modernistic harmonies of color, daringly used, are other effects possible. This new form of interior decoration has come to be called colorama—a word suggesting "dramatic color."

The success of this first installation of its kind suggests the possibilities of this method of decorating halls. It is also a most significant demonstration of the working together of engineer and artist. And in spite of the mechanical background it is evident that this mode of decorating with light can present, under the direction of an artist, the most sensitive color design.

In spite of such inventions as colorama, however, trends toward an even greater use of the mural or wall painting than heretofore are shown in other hostelries. In the New Yorker, recently opened, modern decorative art vies with traditional wall paintings as features of the decoration. Although with some exceptions the chairs and settees follow eighteenth century styles, the upholstery is of the modern design and the carpets show the new combinations of geometrical design and contemporary color schemes. Lighting fixtures are mainly in contemporary forms of opaque etched glass; and architectural details, such as cornices, columns and ceiling ornamentation, reflect the new mode.

Taking the history of the city as the general theme for the wall decoration the artist, Louis Jambor, who painted all the murals in the hotel, has given in the lobby a colorful and quieting accent to the glittering ensemble. One long panel represents the New York of old Dutch days; at the other end of the mezzanine are the skyscrapers of the Manhattan of today. The ceiling panels show other early scenes and, like the other murals, are painted with a gold background.

IT is in the ballroom that the most important effect of wall decorations is apparent. One entire wall, from the low wainscote of reddish marble to the cornice, is covered with six tall panels with narrow pilasters, painted in the prevailing rose hue of the other parts of the walls, dividing them. Here the artist has developed his decorations in gay and striking hues against gold—a harmonious contrast to the silver and gold of the ceiling with its modernistic plaster forms. At each end of the room is a huge mirror of many sections of glass, providing a vista and a light touch to the interior.

In these decorations as well as in those in the foyer of the banquet room near by and in the main dining room the artist has employed as a motif the fairy tales and romances of the old folk-stories. Princes and princesses, with gay courtiers, play in a garden of flowers, tropical birds and garlands—subjects appropriate for festive

NEW HONOR FOR THE SAINT OF MIDINETTES

Subscriptions From the Little Dressmakers' Assistants of Paris Have Set Up a Statue of Catherine, Protector of France's Girlhood

By W. L. MIDDLETON

PARIS.

IN a little street of old Paris pious hands have set up a new statue of Saint Catherine. It is a humble tribute to the vitality of a legend. For centuries the saint of girlhood was one of the most popular objects of adoration in Christendom, second only to Mary Magdalene. Innumerable paintings and sculptures by great masters in churches and art galleries testify to her former prestige. But these works might well envy the simple statue of the Rue de Cléry, for it has its place in the palpitating every-day life of modern Paris.

At noon the narrow, winding streets there become suddenly gay with chattering groups of women and girls coming out from warehouses and shops where the silks and fabrics of the world's fashions are stored and sold. This is preeminently the girls' quarter. Not far distant are the big dressmaking establishments in and around the Rue de la Paix. Forty thousand girls come into the district to work every day. There are few more vivacious scenes anywhere.

Saint Catherine's Day is one of the most spontaneous festivals in the whole calendar of Paris holidays. The girls go to their ateliers, but not to work. It is usual for the employer to be there and treat them to champagne at noon. After this the girls, "Catherinettes" for the day, are free. The whole city takes part in their festival. Balconies above the dressmaking stores in the Rue de la Paix, the Rue Royale and the Champs Elysées are crowded with girls throwing kisses to the passing crowds below. Most of them wear flowered bonnets made specially for the occasion. Throughout the afternoon and evening bands of them may be met everywhere on the boulevards, walking in rows with arms linked.

This custom is the remaining fragment of one that was observed in the Middle Ages from end to end of France. Truth to tell, it has become very much a pagan holiday in modern Paris. The statue of the saint, in its niche above the corner café in the Rue de Cléry, if not altogether neglected, has not been the centre of a fête wholly religious. Canon Ract of the neighboring parish church of Notre-Dame-de-Bonne-Nouvelle, some years ago began an effort to restore to the celebration its religious associations, and it was he who took the lead in having a new statue put up in place of the old one, which was crumbling to ruin.

THE girls of the quarter have shared in providing it, since it has been paid for out of subscriptions from those who frequent a certain dining room, in which they are allowed to eat the frugal lunches they bring from home. Saint Catherine of Alexandria is the heroine of a marvelous legend. She was a girl of surpassing beauty, daughter of a king, who was brought into the presence of the Holy Family in a vision, and was betrothed to the child Jesus, the Virgin Mary giving her a ring. The girl came into conflict with the pagan Emperor Maximinus, whom she rebuked for his cruelty and his worship of false gods. Fifty philosophers were got together to reason with her, but she confounded them all with her arguments. The Emperor ordered her to be broken on the wheel, but that dreadful instrument miraculously flew into fragments before she could be placed on it.

These three incidents form the subjects of most of the Saint Catherine pictures by Fra Angelico, Jan Van Eyck, Masaccio, Tintoretto, Albert Dürer, Correggio, Rubens and the other great artists who have illustrated the story.

The bones of Saint Catherine lie in a famous old monastery at Mount Sinai.

Today the monastery is a picturesque pile of buildings, famous for its eighth century mosaics. Visitors are shown the tomb of the saint with reverent ceremony. It is of white marble ornamented with bas-reliefs. In it are two beautiful gilt reliquaries, one containing the head of the saint and the other one hand, still covered with dark and wrinkled skin. So many gifts of relics have been made during the centuries that these reliquaries contain all that remains at Sinai.

Although Saint Catherine is the one saint to wear the three aureoles—the white one of virginity, the green of learning and the red of martyrdom—she became, especially in France, above all, the saint of girlhood. The cult started in that country at Rouen, where an eleventh century monastery had a finger of the saint as a relic, and the girls' fête, on Nov. 25, was immensely popular in Normandy.

The most celebrated girl worshiper of Saint Catherine was Joan of Arc. The voices she heard, which sent her on her career, were those of Saint Catherine and Saint Margaret, and the former is the one she most frequently mentioned. All through her career Joan seems to have modeled herself on Saint Catherine. It was to the hospital of Sainte-Catherine-de-Fierbois that she went to find the miraculous sword which she carried in battle. At her trial at Rouen, one of the ecclesiastical judges asked her why she always wore a certain ring when she went to the wars. Joan replied: "From pleasure, and because, with this ring on my finger, I touched Saint Catherine when she appeared to me."

No popular festival of girlhood continued through centuries could fail to have its accompanying joke, at any rate in Latin countries. In this instance the joke is to give a particular prominence to old maids. When the village girls went to church on Saint Catherine's Day it was one of the older girls, staid and of proved virtue, who was chosen as queen and had the honor of placing the new bonnet on the statue. In France, a girl who reaches her twenty-fifth birthday without getting married is said to "bonnet Saint Catherine." Hence the bonnets of the Paris midinettes, though it would be rash to assume that they have all attained that age.

In the Paris festival the bonnet traditionally exposes the wearer to the penalty—supposedly a novelty—of being kissed. The compliment is still generously paid by male promenaders, though today the practice has come under the surveillance of the guardians of the peace.

DRAPERIES

The possibilities for beautifying windows, doorways, furniture and occasional wall spaces are perhaps more bountiful today than ever before in history, and quite regardless of the course along which the taste of the individual flows, there are quaint, simple or magnificent draperies, both old and modern, within easy access. Decorators and Merchants, who understand decorative values, offer gracious and reliable assistance—and abundant information will be found every Saturday in the Antiques and Interior Decorations Section of The Sun.

We take them more seriously

THE baby specialist is an important person these days. We take our babies a bit more seriously than they did a few generations ago. We have fewer of them, perhaps, but we keep more of those we have. And a great deal of credit must go to those men who make a special study of the problems that face these tiny newcomers in a turbulent world.

Everything, of course, is pretty important in the care of a baby. But if there is one thing more than another that a baby specialist is particular about, it is milk. That is why we are a bit proud when specialists whose names are known from one end of the country to the other recommend Borden's Grade A specifically to their patients—and when a check-up reveals the interesting fact that nearly a hundred leading baby specialists in New York take Borden's Milk in their homes.

May we serve your family?

the world's distinguished women follow

Pond's 4 steps to beauty

top group . . MRS. CORNELIUS VANDERBILT, JR. . MRS. ALLAN A. RYAN, JR. . MISS HELEN CHOATE

middle group . . MRS. GIFFORD PINCHOT II . LADY VIOLET ASTOR . MRS. ADRIAN ISELIN II

lower group . . THE COUNTESS HOWE . . MRS. JOHN DAVIS LODGE . LADY BUCHANAN-JARDINE

LOOK—and you will see that the world's distinguished women are its most beautiful women, too. Think—and you will be convinced that personal loveliness is a woman's likeliest way to win distinction. Then act—follow the example of the beauties pictured here. Pond's famous Method keeps their skin (as it will keep yours) always clear, smooth, fresh as flowers. Wherever they go, they follow (as you should too) Pond's four steps to beauty.

As Lady Violet Astor says, "Pond's have done a wonderful service to women!"

Beautiful Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr. says, "Even on our Nevada ranch I have my daily facial with Pond's. One can keep one's skin young and lovely with just these marvelous Two Creams, the exquisitely fine Tissues, and the wonderfully invigorating Tonic."

Just four simple steps!

FIRST . . Pond's Cold Cream. "It cleanses divinely!" says Miss Helen Choate. Apply it lavishly all over your face and neck, for pore-deep cleansing. Make a fine art of patting in the cream with gentle, caressing, upward, outward motions. Wait a few moments so the fine oils can sink down into the pores and coax up every speck of dirt to the surface.

SECOND . . Wipe away all cream and dirt with Pond's Cleansing Tissues, following the same caressing motions as before. These velvety new Tissues are soft and amazingly absorbent, more efficacious, more economical than old-time towels and "rags." Mrs. Gifford Pinchot II calls them "the perfect way to remove cold cream."

THIRD . . Pond's Skin Freshener to remove all trace of oiliness after cold cream cleansing, to close and refine the pores. Soak a sizable pad of cotton. Dab briskly till your cheeks glow fresh as a rose. Lady Buchanan-Jardine says this fragrant mild astringent is "just the skin tonic we all need to tone us up."

LAST . . to keep your skin looking fresh and lovely, smooth on Pond's Vanishing Cream, a delicate film before you powder. You will delight in this well-bred "finish." Rouge blends more subtly, powder clings more graciously than ever before. Now your skin is perfect—cleansed, firmed, vital with glowing health, impeccably groomed.

"A straightforward way of keeping fit," beautiful Countess Howe sums it all up. "One can do it all by oneself at home or in the country, wherever one may be. So naturally I'm enthusiastic about Pond's!"

Follow this marvelous Method, and you too, will be enthusiastic—and lovely!

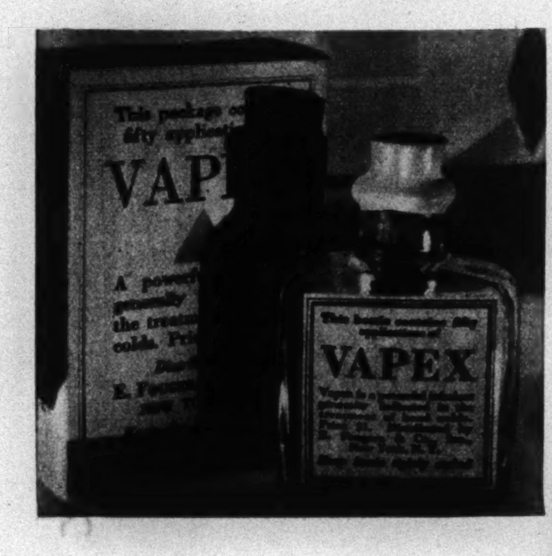
What could be pleasanter than breathing your COLD away!



Avoid the bother of dosing and the mess and fuss . . . just breathe Vapex for all your colds

. . . ANY TIME . . . ANYWHERE

PUT A DROP of Vapex on your handkerchief in the morning. Its fresh, penetrating odor will last all day long. Breathe it often wherever you are. Breathe your cold away.

AT NIGHT, a drop of Vapex at each end of your pillow will fight the infection while you sleep. And Vapex lets you sleep—with a clear head and unobstructed breathing.

LIGHT COLDS, running colds, stuffy colds—breathe them all away with Vapex. Nothing could be more pleasant, for Vapex has a brisk, refreshing effect. Certainly nothing could be easier or swifter. Just a drop of Vapex on your handkerchief—just a few deep whiffs of it—your head clears, your nose opens up, and infection is checked.

A Guarded Secret

During the war, a deadly influenza epidemic was raging in England. But chemists in a famous laboratory completely escaped the disease. The ingredients with which they worked gave off a healing vapor which protected them. These same ingredients are in Vapex today. No one except the scientists who discovered Vapex knows this secret formula. No one can readily imitate Vapex and obtain the same results, for the Vapex formula has been jealously guarded.

For the Whole Family

Colds so often run through the whole family Don't risk this peril. Breathe your colds away at the start with Vapex. A dollar for Vapex now may save dollars and distress later by stopping your cold in its first stages. Keep a bottle of Vapex always handy and check colds before they grip you. For children, particularly, Vapex is very convenient. Put a drop of Vapex on their handkerchiefs when you send them off to school. Use Vapex on their pillows at night and let them breathe their colds away while they sleep. They like Vapex for its crisp, fresh, delightful odor.

Only 2c an Application

Because it is so concentrated, Vapex is quite inexpensive. One application costs only 2c and keeps its strength all day or all night. The $1 bottle contains fifty applications.

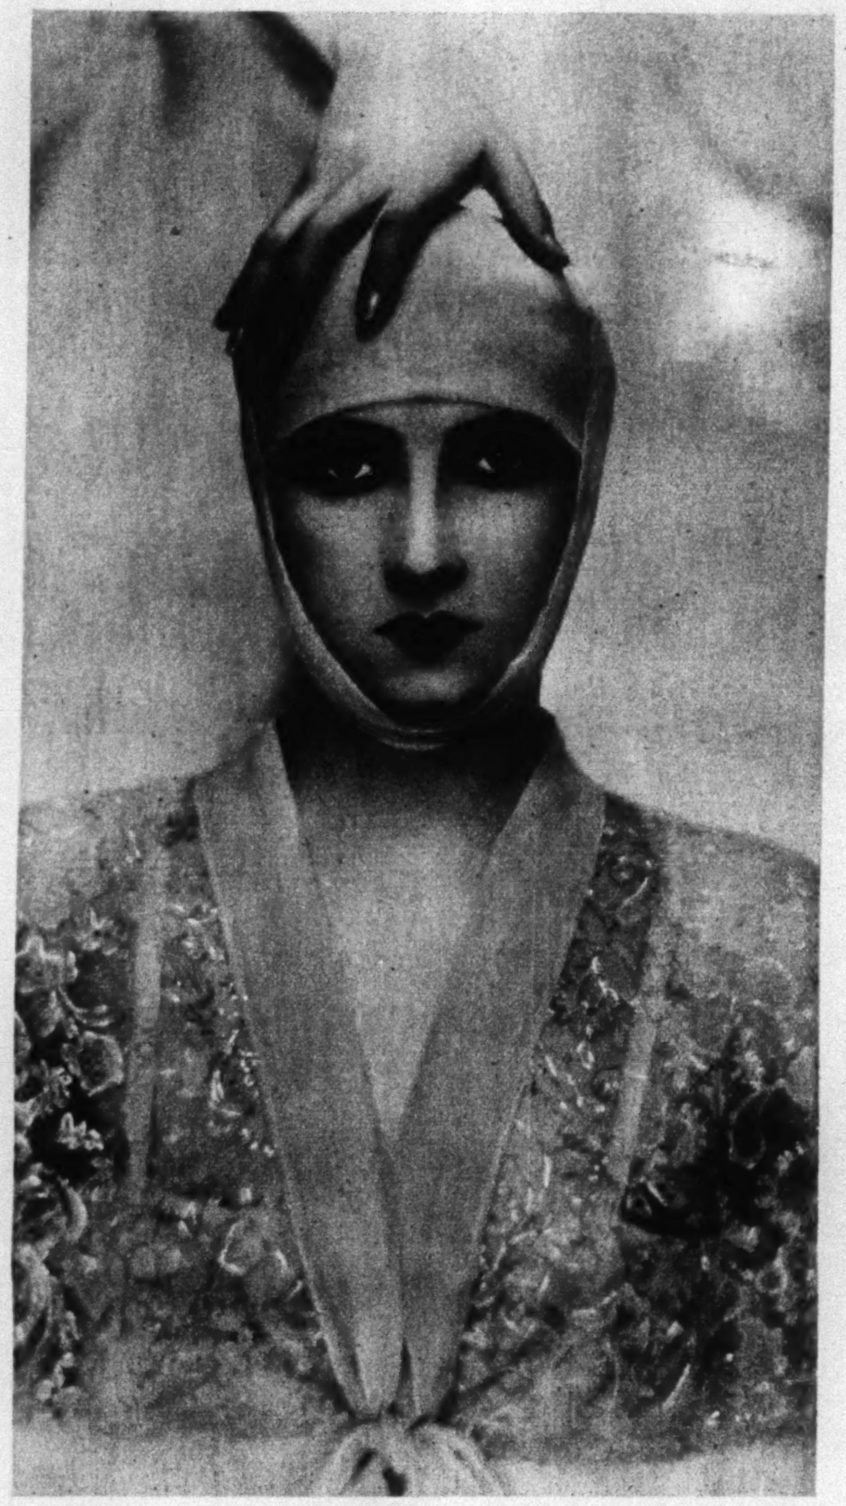
Elizabeth Arden's New Salons

ARE AS BEAUTIFUL AS YOU WOULD EXPECT THEM TO BE



In Elizabeth Arden's New Salons are found all the delightful Arden Treatments, the tried and proven Muscle-Strapping and Skin-Toning — the very successful Firming Treatment. Here the famous Vienna Youth Mask is given and here Miss Arden has enriched her beloved Exercise Department with new joy-giving and beauty-bringing Exercises. Clean-cut profiles are restored. Warm, natural color returns. Years slip away... while to the figure is given a dancer's flame-like grace. Thus in the most approved fashion of two continents, youth is kept. • • • •

For an appointment, at the hour you prefer, please telephone Plaza 5847.

You cannot think of the name of Elizabeth Arden without thinking of Beauty—Miss Arden has identified herself so completely with the creation of loveliness according to her own high standards.

The new Elizabeth Arden Salons at 691 Fifth Avenue are the satisfying expression of this ideal.

OUTWARDLY, they are as enchanting as you would expect when a skilled architect and an inspired decorator create beauty under Miss Arden's own enthusiastic direction. From the moment you enter her favorite red doorway, it is quite unlike anything you have ever seen. It is as though each of Miss Arden's European Salons had surrendered something to this New York Establishment. There is the rich dignity of Old Bond Street in the entrance—the chic of the rue de la Paix the moment you are inside the door—the majesty of Berlin in the spacious rooms — and everywhere a warmth of color and sense of aliveness that bespeaks a strain of the Latin temperament—an imported bit of atmosphere from her famous Salons in Rome and Madrid!

International — cosmopolitan — whatever the setting may be, there is that unity of purpose, that uniformity of treatment and ideals which is only possible when the founder of a great organization continues in active control of its destiny.

It is this which gives to Elizabeth Arden's Salons, Treatments and Preparations their rare quality—the fact that Miss Arden remains, as she has always been, the personal inspiration of the great enterprise which bears her name. Her enthusiasm—which makes her continually seek to give women something always better than they have ever had — her energy — which gives her courage and patience to carry on endless experiments in the pursuit of perfection—are assets so priceless they cannot be measured.

Every time you follow one of Miss Arden's Treatments or use her Preparations, you are receiving the personal care which one woman, who loves beauty above everything, has created to enrich the lives of all other women.

Even if you cannot come to the Salons, you may still be in touch with Miss Arden through her Treatments and Preparations. More than that, you may write to her freely, for counsel, and be assured that every question will receive thoughtful consideration.

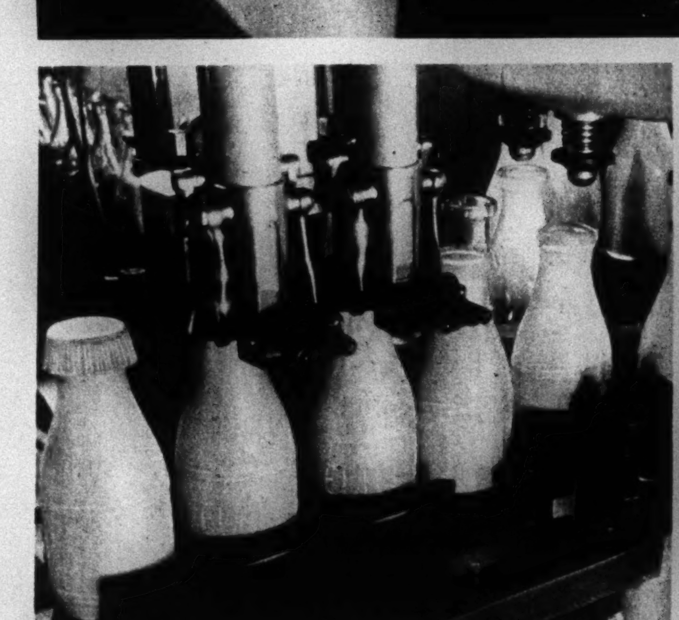
MIDNIGHT ★ ★

AND THE MARCH OF THE MILK BEGINS

Except for the soft breathing of a child in Slumberland, the nursery is soundless. At that moment, the milk he will drink tomorrow is being capped in a bottle. ★ ★ The scene shifts. A Sheffield city plant. You see hundreds of milk-cans, coming in from Sheffield Farms. You observe the silent pasteurizing tanks, which hold the milk at 143°F. for more than 30 minutes so it will be thoroughly protected. You hear the merry clink of innumerable milk-bottles, marching up to be filled, marching out to the waiting wagons. ★ ★ Every night, throughout the various Sheffield city plants, this moving epic of a great city's milk-supply is repeated. It is a fitting sequel to the story enacted on thousands of Sheffield Farms, where well-kept herds produce the finest of country milk. ★ ★ You will enjoy this richer, better-tasting Sheffield Farms Milk. You will be particularly pleased with the smooth efficiency of Sheffield service. Sheffield Farms Milk can be obtained practically everywhere throughout metropolitan New York, northern New Jersey, and Long Island. Call Columbus 8400, or your local Sheffield branch. ★ ★ Sheffield Farms Company, Inc., 524 W. 57th Street, New York. Division of the National Dairy Products Corporation.



After being filled, bottles of Sealect milk are doubly protected by an inside and an outside cap. The last bottle at the left has received its second cap. Later, this cap is sealed around the bottle with wire.

THE BROADWAY PANORAMA AS FEBRUARY LOOMS AHEAD

The Noble Art of Praising

By J. BROOKS ATKINSON.

IN view of the alarms to which literature is subject, the relative concreteness of the drama is a blessing. The battles of Broadway are bloody enough, but they are hardly abstract; they are dollar for dollar. Just now the dogmatists of literary criticism are drawn up in a battle array that looks odd when viewed from the lobby. After some years of subjugation at the hands of the marauding Menckenites, the humanists are stealing forth from their cyclone cellars and offering up their professions of faith, amid what must be described as only intermittent thanksgiving. They have their passionate disciples. A correspondent of The Saturday Review of Literature avows that "the humanism of Norman Foerster is a growing vine, reaching forth to far flowers, yet tendril-twisted to a trellis-work of reason and the past"—though Mr. Foerster, who is a militant humanist, could no doubt find broken slats in that figure of speech.

But the humanists are not unopposed. Already they have met the shock troops of the impressionists, expressionists, expansionists, naturalismists, mechanistics, consciousness intuitionists and others whom God hath put asunder. Names have been called; the lie direct has been passed around freely. After a time the masses will have to choose sides. "I have never been able to see," Swinburne observed, "what should attract a man to the profession of criticism but the noble art of praising." The noble art of praising authors, that is; not the noble art of praising critics. For when critics grow weary of recording the adventures of their souls among masterpieces, they amuse themselves with the subordinate exercise of choosing reasons. It is the reasons that clash; the readers go on selecting "Coronet" or "All Our Yesterdays" without so much as an elbow thrust.

WHAT the physicists would call the time lag keeps the drama two years behind literature. We have yet a year or two of gentlemanly torpor before the drama begins to break up as literature is doing. But one of the distinctions between literature and drama is that no matters of intellectual principle are involved except as minor commentaries upon the play of the moment. In the theatre you must take what you can get from any quarter. Consider how vain it would be to search for any philosophical principle or intellectual trend in the most interesting plays of the last decade: "The First Year," "Six Characters in Search of an Author," "What Price Glory," "The Show-Off," "The Adding Machine," "Young Woodley," "Processional," "The Dybbuk," "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney," "Broadway," "Porgy," "Escape," "In Abraham's Bosom," "The Plough and the Stars," "Paris Bound," "Saturday's Children," "The Royal Family," "Strange Interlude," "Street Scene," "Journey's End." Whenever the merry-go-round of the theatre whirls around an interesting play, every constant theatregoer wants to see it at once. His enjoyment is not much tempered nor his judgment impaired by privately believing that the universe is dual or plural or that man is the master of the machine. Certainly he does not expect the drama to proceed in a logical direction. If a critic started applying the yardstick of philosophy to the regular fare of the theatre, he would soon find himself with a stick but no play. After a time even a critic sees through a windmill.

NOT that dramatic criticism has been without its dogmatists. Jonson and Dryden laid down rules. Dr. Johnson heaped up a very mountain range of rules that yanked Shakespeare this way and that until, after a fashion, he fitted; that condemned imagination ("a licentious and vagrant faculty") because it burst the neat enclosures of regularity, and that looked upon clowning with ponderous suspicion. As soon as Brunetière laid down a few rules, William Archer disputed them; and no sooner had he disputed them than Henry Arthur Jones rose to dispute his disputations. You have no sooner got a few rules in good order than a butcher's son or an upholsterer's son comes in from the provinces and proceeds to entertain the world out of hand. Although every one, including Jonson, agreed that Jonson knew more about the art of drama than Shakespeare, his university knowledge was no match for the intuition of genius. The scholars of his own university recognized that. One of them said as much in "The Scourge": "Few of the University pen plays well; they smell too much of that writer, Ovid, and that writer, Metamorphosis, and talk too much of Proserpina and Juppiter. Why here's our fellow Shakespeare puts them all down, aye, and Ben Jonson, too." After the fray was over, Jonson was man enough to admit it.

Bland as Swinburne's remark may seem to be, it contains as reasonable a principle for criticism as any. "The noble art of praising" is the art of greatest practical use; and the regrets that pursue a critic through life are not of the bad plays he neglected to damn, but of the good plays that, through some astigmatism or excess of caution, he failed to ballyhoo. In all departments of life the yea-sayers are the interesting fellows. Archer is remembered because he championed Ibsen. Now that Huneker is dead, it may be time for the Gradgrinds to tally up his sins, to dwell upon his weakness for European dissenters, his lack of discrimination among idols and his tempestuous facility for making them all sound alike in his prose, so that Ibsen was interchangeable with Whitman as a personality. In view of the size of his canvas and the vividness of his pigments, the wonder was that he made no greater mistakes. Even if he did make errors, there are those who can forgive him. What an interesting fellow he was! How many melomaniacs, iconoclasts, supermen, ivory apes, unicorns and steeplejacks—to use the colored words he loved—might have been neglected if Huneker had not pitched those eruptive sentences into the air!

ALTHOUGH criticism is generally assumed to be fault-finding and censure, it is in a broader sense propaganda for the arts. It recognizes, by its very existence, the value of the art criticized, and the logical assumption is that those who criticize are votaries of the art they are judging, and want to see it in sound artistic health, uncontaminated by the charlatans. The noble art of praising is their strongest weapon. It should be used temperately; for most encounters the flat of the sword is sufficient. But when the time is ripe, the noble art of praising stirs the battalions on both sides. Meanwhile, the humanists and impressionists are likely to be so engrossed in their skirmish to the rear that the main fight will be won before they know it.

The Author of "Strictly Dishonorable" and, by That Token, a Person of Consequence in the New York Theatre. His Name Is Preston Sturges, and Another of His Plays Impends This Week in "Recapture," Which Will Be Made Known at the Eltinge on Wednesday Night.

Hope Williams, Who Will Be Elevated to the Position of Featured Actress in Donald Ogden Stewart's "Rebound." (This Business of "Rebound" and "Recapture" Is, Incidentally, Pretty Confusing.) Mr. Hopkins Will Bring the Stewart Comedy to the Plymouth a Week from Tomorrow Night.

THE WEEK'S OPENINGS

THE WOMEN HAVE THEIR WAY—Tomorrow night at the Civic Repertory Theatre. Another comedy from the Spanish of the industrious Brothers Quintero, translated by the equally industrious Granville-Barkers, will be the fourth production of the season at the Civic Theatre. It will be preceded by Alfred Sutro's playlet, "The Open Door." Eva Le Gallienne will have the leading rôles in both presentations.

THE CHOCOLATE SOLDIER—Tomorrow night at Jolson's Theatre. The Oscar Straus operetta, based, of course, on Mr. Shaw's "Arms and the Man," and the first of two musical revivals this week. Charles Purcell will be both visible and audible in the title rôle, and the other players will include Roy Cropper and Vivian Hart.

SARI—Tuesday night at the Liberty Theatre. The Kalman operetta in which Mitzi, who will again have the title rôle, first appeared here—it was at the Liberty Theatre, incidentally—in January, 1914. The cast this time will include Boyd Marshall, Marjorie Sweet, Warren Proctor and, strangely enough, Bernard Jukes, who was in "Dracula" ever and ever so long.

RECAPTURE—Wednesday night at the Eltinge Theatre. A play upon which more than ordinary attention focuses because it is the work of the Preston Sturges who wrote "Strictly Dishonorable." Ann Andrews will be the principal performer; others in the company will include Melvyn Douglas, Glenda Farrell, Hugh Sinclair and Cissie Loftus.

GENERAL JOHN REGAN—Wednesday night at the Irish Theatre. A revival of the farce-comedy by George A. Birmingham (Canon James Owen Hannay) which was first produced here by Mr. Tyler in 1913 and for which George Jean Nathan has long done his share of cheering.

NEWS AND GOSSIP OF THE TIMES SQUARE SECTOR

The Maaskoff Family—Mr. Woods and the Chicago "Strictly Dishonorable"

LIKE father, it seems, unlike son—at least in name. The son of Maurice Moscovitch, also an actor, is known as Nat Madison. Incidentally, he is likely to be seen here in a play before long. The family name, when you come right down to it, is neither Moscovitch nor Madison, but Maaskoff. Still another son, Anton Maaskoff, is a violinist of repute, at present in Vienna. The third and final son is named Harry Maaskoff and seems to be unfired by artistic ambition. Anyhow, he is in the pants business in London.

Nat Madison, who is pretty well known in Australia and at least a little bit in London, may appear in one of A. H. Wood's forthcoming productions. After "Recapture" Mr. Woods will proceed to the presentation of a play now known as "Man's Enemy," in which Alice Brady will have the star rôle. It is a piece from the French, and has been adapted by the Hattons, who have not been writing for the Broadway stage in recent years. The rumor about the play has it that, like "Outward Bound," all its characters are dead people.

Both the Shuberts and the Erlangers have been battling to get "Strictly Dishonorable" for Chicago, but it will go to the Adelphi, which is controlled by neither of them (Mr. Woods is the lucky man.) It will arrive there—not the New York company, of course—in another two weeks.

The Winter Garden, after all, will continue as a picture house, and Mr. Leslie's "International Revue," accordingly, will in all probability come to the Majestic. Its out-of-town première, by the way, will take place in Philadelphia on Thursday of this week. . . . Speaking of such things, there is still speculation about where Mr. Ziegfeld will put the Ed Wynn show, which opened in Boston on Friday, and when these notes were written there was doubt about a theatre for "The Nine-Fifteen Revue," which got under way in New Haven on Wednesday. Mrs. Selwyn's show has been scheduled for the Music Box, but it may land somewhere else.

Clare Eames, who seems to have given up America for England, will presently act over there in a revival of "Milestones." And Ivor Novello is talking about coming here in the Fall to act in "Symphony in Two Flats," in which he is having a successful London run at present.

And that, in turn, leads to the fact that Seymour Hicks is in town at the moment. Mr. Hicks was for many years one of London's leading comedians, and is still an actor-manager to be reckoned with. It is nothing but the desire for a holiday that has brought him here, he says; he will go back home in about two more weeks.

A play on the Frankenstein legend and called simply "Frankenstein" will open in London in another two weeks and has been bought for this side by Mr. Liveright. It won't reach here before next season. . . . As The London Morning Post points out, there have been plays on the Frankenstein idea before. One of them, of course, was "R. U. R."

English plays on the way to town include "The Infinite Shoeblack" and "The Matriarch," both of which have already been acted in Chicago (the latter opened there last Tuesday). They may both arrive during the week of Feb. 17.

One of the plays that the renascent Jed Harris is toying with is said to be a comedy by Martha Madison and Eva K. Flint, the two young women who wrote "Subway Express." It is called "The Up and Up," and it may be that Dorothy Stickney will be in it. Miss Stickney it was who so graphically acted the girl of the streets in "The Front Page."

Mr. Harris has also acquired the dramatization of Liam O'Flaherty's novel "Mr. Gilhooley." It is a play that he has had his eye on for some time.

George Jessel, although you'd think that "Even in Egypt" would keep him pretty busy these days, is proceeding with the production of a play called "A Cup of Coffee," written by Willard Robertson—also an actor in "The Front Page," incidentally. It will go into rehearsal the middle of this week and Mr. Robertson himself will be in it.

Talking about "Even in Egypt," that entertainment is the production of John Golden, but he is content to watch its progress from afar. The play is now in Philadelphia, undergoing, of course, the customary break-in alterations, but Mr. Golden left calmly for Palm Beach ten days ago. Possibly he felt that Mr. Jessel could be trusted to bring the play to town in good shape. Anyhow, it is due here the week after next.

The ticket brokers say that only six productions are absolutely selling out these nights. They give their names as "Berkeley Square," "Strictly Dishonorable," "Strike Up the Band," "Sons o' Guns," "Michael and Mary" and "Fifty Million Frenchmen." Quite a number of shows are coming close to it, but this is a stern and ruthless estimate, and facts are facts.

Gilbert Miller, mindful of the pending ticket restrictions, has contracted with the brokers to sell them seats for "Dishonored Lady" up to and no later than the first of March, which is when it is hoped to get the new régime under way. On the other hand, the same brokers are said to have bought most of the seats for "Strike Up the Band" for no less than twenty-four weeks. So what?

They say that the Theatre Guild has a Philip Barry play in its possession—a comedy by the name of "Hotel Universe." It may be done this season.

The Guild will take the precaution of acting Mr. Shaw's "The Apple Cart" out of town before the New York opening. The play will open in Baltimore on Feb. 17.

It will be one of the most interesting periods of the season—the week beyond this. On Monday Mr. Stewart's "Rebound," with Hope Williams in it, will be seen at the Plymouth, and on the same night a play called "Many a Slip" will open at the Little Theatre. On Tuesday Miss Cornell will appear at the Empire in "Dishonored Lady," and on Wednesday there will be two premières of interest—Leslie Howard's adaptation of the play called "Out of a Blue Sky," coming to the Booth, and Dana Burnet's "The Boundary Line," to be seen at the Forty-eighth Street. Mr. Jessel's aforesaid play is all but definite for the John Golden and there is also the bare possibility of the Fred Stone show at the New Amsterdam.

"Out of a Blue Sky," which comes to the Booth a week from Wednesday, is one of those plays in which the actors emerge from the audience. It begins with stagehands on a bare stage, and calls its chief players up from the auditorium.

It takes a long while, sometimes, for a play to reach its production—and then often it doesn't get it. Samson Raphaelson's "Harlem" was sold first to the Theatre Guild, then to Miss Le Gallienne's organization. Now one of the less weighty producers has it, and says that he will really produce it. There was a "Harlem" two seasons ago, so Mr. Raphaelson's play will be known as "White Man."

Lenore Ulric, being without a play, has moved to Hollywood, and will probably be a picture actress. Fay Bainter, although she has some sort of contract with Mr. Woods, is also going coastward to act in films. . . . And, even though the information infringes slightly on the prerogatives of the picture department, the Los Angeles papers have it that Lillian Gish will do "Strange Interlude" in pictures. Maybe.

It's said, too, that George Gershwin and Herbert Fields will write a musical piece to be called "The Big Charade," and that Sam H. Harris will produce it next season.

Arthur Hammerstein may be back in this town in about five weeks. He went to the Coast to make a talking picture, it may be remembered, and, strangely enough, he is making it.

Charles D. Brown, who is not usually associated with anything so frivolous as musical comedy, is about to replace Robert Emmett Keane in "Sweet Adeline." Mr. Keane will go to the Coast to—oh, you know how that finishes!

Miriam Hopkins will act with Mr. Truex in "Ritzy," which used to be known as "Dress Parade." . . . Tom Powers, who has been acting in "Strange Interlude" for years and years, is coming back to play the King Magnus rôle in "The Apple Cart." . . . . William Faversham is going to Australia for six months to act a series of plays. He leaves immediately. . . . Mrs. Fiske's next play is almost ready. Its name is "The Family Blues" and it will open at the Cort in another two weeks. "Your Uncle Dudley," when that happens, will go to Chicago. . . . Mr. Cohan's next production, "Sporting Blood," will come along about Feb. 24. Walter Connolly is in it. . . . The Theatre Guild still doesn't know which play Mr. Lunt and Miss Fontanne will next act in. They—or it—is now in the act of deciding. . . . "Red Rust" is announced as being in its final week. Next at the Beck will be "The Apple Cart."

Roger Pryor is now named for the play called "Apron Strings," due here in about two more weeks. . . . And James Rennie is to take over the Lou Tellegen rôle in "Escapade," soon to go on tour again. It will be recalled that Mr. Tellegen is in a hospital, recovering from the effects of a hotel fire.

Mr. White's "Scandals" will go to Philadelphia in another two weeks—"Flying High," it will be remembered, is to occupy the Apollo after that. "The Street Singer," according to the Philadelphia papers, will also take to the road in a few weeks. Ditto "The Criminal Code."

There is the tale of an actor who was owed wages by the management of a current attraction and who feared that the play might suddenly be shot from under him. Accordingly, he fared forth and purchased a diamond ring, giving instructions that it should be sent C. O. D. to the box office of his theatre. The story further has it that the box office man duly paid for the ring and handed it over to the actor, but if you believe it you don't know box office men. Or actors, either.

A Play By the Poet Laureate

LONDON, Jan. 9.

TWO plays of unusual interest have appeared this week. The first is "The Humours of the Court" by Robert Bridges, the Poet Laureate, which has been given two performances in the Arts Theatre by past and present members of the Oxford University Dramatic Society, assisted by Edith Evans and by several other actresses of high distinction. The production originated as a tribute of honor to the Poet Laureate. He is now an old man full of honors. He has recently been awarded the Order of Merit and last year confounded those who have ignorantly accused him of being an unproductive poet by publishing "The Testament of Beauty," an epic poem of the first rank. Many years ago he wrote a series of plays in verse. None of them, so far as I am aware, has ever been performed, and it has always been said that they were intended for the library rather than for the stage. With the exception of "Nero," they are all preceded by an acknowledgement that they are written in some particular "manner"—in "the Latin manner" or in "the Elizabethan manner"—and there has been a tendency among critics to treat them as exercises in scholarship and little more.

"The Humours of the Court" is no exception to this rule. It also is derivative, having a Spanish origin in Calderon and Lope. One's tendency in reading it is to admire detached passages of verse, but to assume that a piece so highly artificial and depending so little upon any genuine emotional movement must fall dead in the theatre. The experiment of setting it upon the stage has been justified by a delightful surprise. It is, I think, too fragile a plant to endure the rough blasts of the commercial theatre, but there was never any question of the enjoyment of the special audiences that were privileged to see it. It is a tale of lightly amorous intrigue with an Italian setting, and if I were to attempt to relate the story of it I should inevitably become entangled in the web of plot and counterplot. Nor should I fairly represent it. What is of importance is this: That Dr. Bridges has stamped his own individuality on his Spanish model, preserving the artificial manner but touching it with a kind of magical gentleness and freshness, so that where you had hoped for little more than to look upon stiff, artificial flowers prettily arranged, you find yourself enjoying a play that has the authentic bloom of Spring upon it. If it were clumsily acted, it would be intolerable. There is so little feeling in it that it would fall to dust beneath any touch but the most delicate. But it has been extremely well performed, Edith Evans and Robert Harris particularly distinguishing themselves, and its humor and sentiment emerge as equal parts of a light, polished and, above all, a charming entertainment.

The second, of which I must not write at great length for it has, I believe, been made familiar in New York by a production in Eva Le Gallienne's theatre, is "L'Invitation au Voyage" by Jean-Jacques Bernard which has been given in an English version by Ernest Boyd at the Everyman Theatre—the same theatre of enterprise and experiment that was responsible for the performance of a play by Ostrovsky of which I wrote in these columns recently. "L'Invitation au Voyage," now called "Illusion," is not the best of M. Bernard's work, but it is a revealing example of his method—a method of dramatic suggestion rather than of dramatic statement. It is a tale of a woman's increasingly powerful illusion that she is in love with an absent man, Philippe, who never appears upon the stage, but whose empty chair is continuously before our eyes. The empty chair is the

CONCERNING THE THEATRE AND THOSE WHO WORK IN IT

Heading For Broadway

GAZELLE-LIKE from Rochester and the portals of that theatre called the Lyceum, where Katharine Cornell was starring last week in "Dishonored Lady," comes the reassuring news that the wages of sin is still death and that the playhouse is not altogether lost to dramas in which an ugly heredity crops out distressingly in a beautiful heroine toward the end of Act Two. What with her experience as the Countess Olenska in the enduring "Age of Innocence," this acting of wayward ladies is, of course, but child's play now to Miss Cornell. Nevertheless, she thrilled her up-State public neatly, with the aid, naturally, of the authors, Margaret Ayer Barnes and Edward Sheldon, and some other players, among them Francis Lister, Paul Harvey and Fortunio Bonanova. A. J. Warner of The Rochester Times-Union goes to the play:

"The action of the piece, which is a story of today, takes place in New York. There are three acts, each of which is divided into two scenes. Madeline Cary is the product of old and new New York. She is a lady born and her father is a proud resident of Washington Square, but in her blood is the taint of unbridled passion, inherited from her mother, who had lived as she saw fit and died in the squalor of a fourth-rate pension in Nice.

"Madeline, a cosmopolite, had once met at a dance in Paris a South American bounder named José Moreno, who so succumbed to her charms that from the time of their chance encounter abroad until the night on which the play opens—and she, out of boredom and badness, comes to see him in his rooms in New York—he had followed her with tokens of admiration.

"The second scene of the first act, five months later, transpires in the library of Rufus Cary's house on Washington Square, on the evening of a dinner party at which one of the guests is a young Englishman, Lord Farnborough, who has fallen in love with her and she with him. Madeline's code forces upon her the conviction that her clandestine life makes her unfit to have the happiness this high-minded romance holds out and her refusal is only retracted after a partial confession, which is lightly dismissed. With the announcement of the engagement there is a disconcerting visit from Moreno, who threatens dire things unless Madeline remains his, and demands that she come to him that night at 3. Goaded to desperation at the thought of losing the man she loves, she picks up a bottle of strychnine.

"In Moreno's apartment early the next morning Madeline pours the deadly drug into his coffee, but not until she has fallen once more under the spell of his amorous protestations. The scene shifts to the Cary library late that evening and to the most effective and dramatic moments of the play, with Madeline, the news of the murder out, becoming ever more inextricably involved in the web of suspicion."

G. B. STERN'S play "The Matriarch," derived by her own hand from her novel of the same name (it has been called "Tents of Israel," too), has not only arrived on these shores, but has made what may be regarded as its American début. Made known, as The Chicago Tribune's Mr. Donaghey likes to say, at the Princess Theatre in Chicago on Tuesday night, it impressed Mr. Donaghey then and there with having "taken for stage use the part of the tale most serviceable in the theatre." And though the cast lacks Mrs. Patrick Campbell of the London production, it does have Constance Collier. * * * Mr. Donaghey's epitomization is here set before a restless New York populace, which will probably have to wait until the week of Feb. 17 to see for itself:

"She [Miss Stern] takes from the book the incidents and episodes in the adult career of Anastasia Rakonitz which have to do with Oliver Maitland and his casual son by Plymouth Nell, Danny. The scene throughout is England, and a quarter-century is spanned in the time of action.

"Oliver, in the brief prologue, runs away from Sophie after she has taken the boy and informed the family that it is her own. Oliver refuses longer to be led by Anastasia; he turns his back on the Rakonitz wealth and its possibilities because he feels that he is, as a 'goy,' an outsider, and is tolerated only because he is Sophie's husband. . . .

"And, as Danny Maitland, the boy is raised into manhood as a Rakonitz; only Sophie knows that he isn't. He is, in time, betrothed to the lovely Toni, whom he believes to be his cousin. He loves her, he says, but doesn't like her. The 'goy' in him rebels against what he detects in her to be a spiritual resemblance to Anastasia. Then, twenty-five years after his flight, Oliver returns, tells the lad the truth about his birth, and gives to him a thousand dollars with the fatherly implication that the best use the lad can possibly make of the gift is to run away.

"Danny runs away; but Toni is the true heiress to all that is Anastasia, who, a tired and fed-up old leader, passes to the grandchild the crown and the torch. As the final curtain slowly falls Toni is the new Matriarch."

CAPRICES VIENNOIS

FOR several reasons, just one of which is the continuance of the Jolson's Theatre Musical Comedy Company, there will come to town this week revivals of two operettas of a school generally labeled Viennese. They are, to withhold the exciting news no longer, "The Chocolate Soldier" and "Sari," and they are the works of two of the better knowns in this pleasant field of musical romance. In fact, along with Franz Lehar, whose "Merry Widow" has already had a rehearing this season, Oscar Straus of "The Chocolate Soldier" and Emmerich Kalman of "Sari" constitute the melodious Big Three—the Kerns, Gershwins and Rombergs—of whatever corresponds to Tin-Pan Alley in Vienna.

One of them, indeed, should be in this country at the moment. Like many another who has made his mark in the theatre, Straus has succumbed to the lure of Hollywood gold. He was supposed to have arrived in New York yesterday and he will go to the Coast next week for Warner Brothers.

His "Chocolate Soldier" was the production here on Sept. 13, 1909, of Fred C. Whitney, who may still be found at his office in the New Amsterdam Theatre Building, although he has not recently been active as a manager. Mr. Whitney had purchased the American rights in London before the operetta was produced anywhere, but he subsequently acquired and used the British version when George Edwardes decided, on the basis of reports from Vienna and an inspection of the piece in Berlin, that London would not care for "The Chocolate Soldier." This judgment Mr. Whitney, to his own profit, later proved inaccurate.

Not long before the première here, some kind friend had told Mr. Whitney that he had seen the show in Vienna and that it was impossible. Other managers were inclined to laugh at the idea of setting Mr. Shaw's "Arms and the Man" to music, but Mr. Whitney went right ahead, presenting the piece first at the Lyric, Philadelphia, then at the Lyric, New York, and later—believe the coincidence or not—at the Lyric, London. The New York notices were better than good, but, as the producer recalls it, business was not until ten weeks or so had elapsed. Then the operetta caught on. Four companies were sent on tour, in one of which Charles Purcell, at the time a youth in his 'teens, played the leading rôle of Lieutenant Bumerli, which he will again essay tomorrow night at Jolson's.

Straus has two other outstanding works to his credit, "The Last Waltz" and "The Waltz Dream," the latter of which is said to have proved even more remunerative than "The Chocolate Soldier," with its popular "My Hero" waltz. He is a trained musician, and began his musical career as conductor of grand opera, principally in Mayence. In 1901 he turned up in Berlin, having abandoned the more serious musical forms, and with the Baron Ernst Van Wolzogen he established the famed Ueberbrettl. Straus composed operettas that were produced there and induced well-known poets and singers to write for it. After that he became really active in the field of light opera and operetta. Straus has earned considerable from his music—the American royalties from "The Chocolate Soldier" alone were a small fortune. He has long been a familiar figure in the coffee houses of Vienna, which may be good news for the boys at the Montmartre and other Hollywood hangouts. His latest work, "Marietta," written with Sacha Guitry, is liked by travelers who have seen it in Vienna recently. As the one "s" in his last name might indicate, he is no relation of the other musically celebrated Viennese Strausses—Richard and the dynasty founded by Johann, the waltz king.

Kalman is, to be quite captious about it, not Viennese by birth, but by tradition. He was born in Budapest, as was Mitzi, who returns in the "Sari" revival, and attended the Academy of Dramatic Arts and the Royal Academy of Music. One of his classmates at the latter place was Paul Yartin, who, since it really is a small world after all, is directing the orchestra for the revival. According to Yartin, Kalman in those days was a serious student and showed no interest in writing anything of a lower musical form than an opera or a symphony. Kalman's efforts at symphonic composition were, however, played only before small groups, and his attempted opera was too much for him. Then he became fascinated by the story of Pali Racz, a fecund gypsy fiddler of the neighborhood, who had thirty sons, most of whom grew up to become fiddlers on their own account and rivals of their father. From a libretto based on some facts about the Racz family, Kalman began his score and found himself at home with the Magyar melodies, including the "Ha-Za-Za" folk dance which so enlivens "Sari."

About a fortnight after its première in Vienna "Sari" was presented in Budapest, then in Berlin and soon in whole series of European cities. Exactly sixteen years and two weeks ago come Tuesday night the operetta was revealed by the late Henry W. Savage at the same Liberty Theatre to which it is now returning.

Mitzi in those distant days used her full name of Mitzi Hajos and was more or less of a stranger to New York audiences. William Morris had been her particular Columbus. On one of his Continental scouting expeditions he had found her giving a program of impersonations, which included a burlesque of Rostand's "Chantecler," and he brought her here as "the wonder child of the Hungarian stage" to do Chantecler on the New York roof. She spoke no English, but that was not necessary. Feathers and all, she survived one of the hottest Summers in Broadway history and went on to appear at the Winter Garden in "La Belle Paree" and to tour in "The Spring Maid" before Colonel Savage put her in "Sari." In New York and on the road that name part occupied her attention for two years, after which she played in a succession of shows that need not to be recounted at this particular date.

It was first planned to do the "Sari" revival in Hungarian, but it seems that Mitzi had some difficulty in remembering the Hungarian equivalent for the lines and lyrics she had carefully learned in English. She was even criticized for speaking her native tongue with an "American" accent. So when some reasonably interested if only moderately innocent bystanders proposed a switch back to English, she was willing enough to make the change.

As for Kalman, since "Sari" he has been represented on Broadway by "Countess Maritza," "The Circus Princess" and by part of the score of "Golden Dawn" among others. And there are still reports that his "Duchess of Chicago," recently tried out by the Shuberts, may yet be brought to this town.

A PARIS PLAY IN A NOBLE TRADITION

PARIS, Jan. 9.

"AMIS COMME AVANT," at the Théâtre Antoine, is the work of a young author, who had already, in "Toi que j'ai tant aimé," shown promise of exceptional qualities as a dramatist. What specially distinguishes Henri Jeanson is the capacity to give a certain touch of the universal to his characters, who are not so much types of the manners of today as types of humanity. If it is destined to live, therefore, his work will perhaps not bear its date so clearly as that of most of his contemporaries. This, however, is the wildest speculation, for it is not only quite impossible to guess what work will be living thirty years hence, but quite likely that what will survive is just what we now consider to belong most exclusively to our period—and it may survive, either for the very reason that it is characteristic of our period, or because it has general merits which will pierce through its merely temporary modishness.

All that can be said today is that Henri Jeanson's play has, for an audience of today, the quality of presenting real persons, who—except at one point—express themselves and develop themselves by means of the dramatic action, as persons in a play should do.

It is a play about a nagging wife. There have been many plays about nagging wives. Molière, Courteline and Henri Becque—to speak of French dramatists alone—have all written masterpieces about the type. It says much for Henri Jeanson that he has been admitted by French critics not only to have proved his right to treat the subject again, but to hold up his head in the company of such giants.

Not that his play is without faults. Its chief fault is that its best act is the first, and that is a serious fault in the theatre—or at least a serious obstacle to success. Another fault, if the play is to be judged by the high standard which it deserves, is that there is an interval of three years between the first act and the second, and that the woman who comes before us when the curtain rises for the second time has profoundly changed in character—or in the external aspects of character—from the woman whom we had seen when the curtain fell. For any serious break in continuity is a handicap to real drama, and although characters may and indeed should change, or rather develop, the audience should be able to watch the development arising from the action, as, indeed, it can in every other part of this very play.

The "friends as before" of the title are not, as might be expected, the husband and the wife, but the father and the son. The husband has supported the exacting, fault-finding and intolerable temperament of his wife merely because he refuses to ruin his son's prospects by leaving her until the boy is settled. So he submits to being humiliated in private and caressed in public, to being accused of being discourteous when he reads his paper and disgusting when he smokes his pipe, to being denied, in fact, the peace and quiet which is all that he really wants.

At last, when the boy's future is assured, he tells his son that he intends shortly to go downstairs and buy some cigars, but not to come up again. He leaves a letter for his wife. "Ah," says she, when the boy gives it to her, "Monsieur is even afraid of saying what he wants to say to his wife. He can only write it. Well, let us read his letter"—and the curtain falls.

When it rises again, the husband is not there, but the wife is not alone. If there had been an excuse for her temper, it was that her nature required a husband quite different from the placid father of her son. The satisfaction which she could not find in him she now seeks in one lover after another. We are now at the fourth, but this one evidently does not come up to the ideal, for, although she keeps him in funds, she is no more agreeable to him than she had been to her husband. The difference is that he answers back.

In the third act the husband comes upon the scene again. He comes for the sake of the boy, whose matrimonial prospects are being ruined by his mother's wild life. Now that he is no longer in chains, the husband shows himself to be capable of decisive action. He drives out the lover, and forces the wife to confess her faults. As she does so, and as he realizes that she has been to other men what she had never been to him, he is suddenly seized with desire for her. They even propose to resume their life together, but hardly have they begun the experiment than the old nagging begins again, and he goes, this time for good.

The play is interpreted by two admirable players in Alcover and Mme. Sylvia, both of whom are invaluable to the author, and by a cast which is uniformly good.

The Grand Guignol has produced a new program, but you would hardly notice the change from the old one. It seems recently to have taken Soviet Russia as the universal provider of its horrors, and the most disreputable resorts of Paris or the provincial towns as the scene of most of its comic interludes. Each formula is a little worn. PHILIP CARR.

PANACEA FOR THE ONE-NIGHT STAND

Mr. Sarg's Puppets, Following in a Famous Wake, Rediscover The Good Old Road

THROUGHOUT the sector brightly called Times Square there loiters, as every thirty-third degree loiterer knows, a great army of hollow-eyed people who wait against discouraging odds to sob on any one's shoulder and cry out that the road is dead. (For the benefit of passengers who are still riding, this will not be a story about the passing of the old theatre.) * * * They will go on to tell you that the road, lest the term drop entirely out of the language, was a middling piece of territory that stretched from Newark to the West Coast doors of moviedom, and that it coined money in appealing quantities for E. H. Sothern, Mrs. Fiske, David Warfield and their like, all of whom know better now. For the one-night stand, in case you tried to play one as lately as last week, has virtually perished of fiscal malnutirition and even, it is whispered, of a cold in the public shoulder.

In West Ninth Street, however, the hue and cry of Longacre Square resound but faintly if at all, and there, in the almost mythical Tony Sarg studio, is, not unsurprisingly, Mr. Sarg himself, listening to these plaints and smiling in a mild contentment. Mr. Sarg smiles, and, as but one of his manifold activities, goes on fashioning marionettes. Mr. Sothern has retired, but a two-foot Rip Van Winkle stands them up in 150 towns a year, from October until May, and even now a company of the Tony Sarg marionettes is in the course of its annual tour, booked solidly to the Pacific Coast and back on an eight months' junket. Two performances a day, at a $500 guarantee. Mr. Sarg, reading the daily reports from his company manager, contends that the road is perfectly all right. It simply takes a bit of managing.

It is clear now, or it should be, that puppetry has grown apace from a fad into a serious theatrical business; or, rather, that it has come back to the high estate it held as an art and a profession in ancient days and on old and other stages. For Mr. Sarg, in company with the modern puppeteers, is but reviving a great tradition that flourished in Greece and Rome, was a popular diversion of the masses in Italy in the Middle Ages, and rose to really great heights when, in the seventeenth century, fanatical assaults upon the stage closed the legitimate theatres and turned the public toward the puppet plays. It has been a profession with its great masters who gloried in their secrets; who, indeed, kept them so darkly that often they died together, an unfortunate and obviously retarding practice for those who followed and were obliged slowly to learn their craft alone.

Attest, for instance, the case of Mr. Sarg himself who, as a young artist in London and casting about for a hobby, journeyed a score of years ago to see the puppet show of the English master, Holden. Curtly rebuffed by the latter when he made inquiries, Mr. Sarg and a pair of opera glasses attended some fifty performances and learned the important anatomical fact that the middle section of a puppet is empty. This was easy and he set about creating them for himself. A happily inventive person, he constructed a controller to handle all of the twenty-four strings required to manipulate each figure. Soon he was giving performances in no less hallowed a spot than the Old Curiosity Shop. And then, in 1915, he was on his way to the United States.

It was fourteen years ago that Mr. Sarg, under the sponsorship of Winthrop Ames, made his first professional production, a bill of three modest dramas entitled, respectively, "The Three Wishes," "The Green Suit" and "The Stolen Beauty and the Great Jewel." Marionettes were a pleasant occupation, and people were dabbling in them, as, indeed, they still are. But now there are a score of professional troupes, at least one of which—the Sarg company—goes on a tour that is plotted and prepared with an astonishing fidelity to the details of a legitimate road production.

VAUDEVILLE

PALACE—Here is Irene Bordoni offering "a cycle of favorite songs" . . . Miss Bordoni is generally referred to as being piquant. Joe Wilton and Rex Weber are comedians as well as "vocal illusionists," and Lina Basquette's offering is "A Hollywood (and not a Des Moines or Sandusky, mind you) Fantasy." Josephine Harmon is also singing a "cycle of songs" (there is practically no limit to this sort of thing), and Larry Rich's orchestra indulges in some specialties. Other entertainers, as they are optimistically known, are James J. Corbett and Neil O'Brien, Buck and Bubbles, Harriman-Swan and Lucille, and the Luster Brothers.

RIVERSIDE — Harry Krivit's "Femme Follies" (a girl revue, to you) is to be found at this house. Johnny Marvin will be the headliner later in the week, supported on the bill by John Bowers and Marguerite de la Motte, not unknown to the cinema.

LOEW'S STATE—Georgie Price is the headliner here in an act with the title, for which the responsibility has not yet been fixed, of "What Price Georgie?" Lewis Armstrong and Company, late of "Hot Chocolates." Bob Albright and others are also on the program.

EIGHTY-FIRST STREET—Charles Bennington's newsboy performers play harmonicas and, like Mr. Bennington, are also monoped dancers. There are two other acts, and the bill will remain throughout the week.

HIPPODROME—Toto the clown, Buster Shaver's "Tiny Town Revue" and three other numbers are guaranteed to be putting in a week's appearance here.

When, in the Fall, a Sarg company starts on the road, its two-a-day tour has been booked a year in advance in universities, clubs and legitimate theatres. In the company are a manager, eight puppeteers, musicians and a wardrobe mistress, and they will give a show in any area that is eighteen feet square and has fifteen feet of clearance overhead. They carry their equipment, valued at $5,000 and consisting of footlights, spotlights, switchboards and dolls, in the demountable trunks that serve as stages. The production will, by the time it is ready for the road, have been two months in a state of rehearsal, an arduous process that takes place in an Eighth Street loft during the Summer.

The loft is Mr. Sarg's experimental theatre, and it sees the handlers rehearsed for lines and music, and the dolls cast in the plays, each in the single rôle to which it is limited. It is feverishly hard work, for the candidates for careers in puppeteering are as earnest in their way as that stage-struck multitude that yearns for the footlights and succeeds in populating most of the metropolitan park benches. Mr. Sarg admits that they are a problem, these eager people, since they remain consistently undaunted by his axiom that there is no such thing as a perfect puppeteer, and that mere competence in the craft is a matter of years. No one is even accepted on trial who cannot play at least one musical instrument, (a flageolet player, for instance, is considered a prize), nor is a neophyte even allowed to rehearse with the veterans until he has had a month of gruelling practice. Mr. Sarg is reckoned a thoroughgoing task master, and, since he puts approximately $10,000 into each new show, it will perhaps be admitted that it is his privilege to be as thoroughgoing as he pleases. In the first days of the Summer there will be fits of theatrical temperament—tear-stained lady puppeteers will complain that another handler has cut in with a laugh induced by the twitch of a facetious puppet leg. There will be jealous objections that a costume does not suit a voice. But, finally, the guarantees and contracts having long been in, the show will be ready for the road. And then, with the final approval of the producer, and with four union "labor" men who are alleged to shift scenery but actually do nothing at all at $9 a day—when these preparations have been made, the show will actually start out.

Thackeray's "The Rose and the Ring," written by the novelist expressly for puppet use, was the first Sarg production to attain to the dignity of a road tour; and, with "Rip Van Winkle," it has enjoyed the greatest popularity before all types of audiences. The writing of the plays is a tricky business, of which only those who know the limitations of marionettes are capable. For that reason, perhaps, all of the plays are subject to some rewriting by Mr. Sarg, and they have included such memorable pieces as "Treasure Island," "Hansel and Gretel," "Little Red Riding Hood," "The Pied Piper of Hamelin" and the tale of Ali Baba and his prehistoric pineapple throwers. New plays are added slowly to the repertory, for apparently the public never tires of the familiar stories, and Mr. Sarg seems now to know the reason for puppetry's unaging charm. "The only real excuse for the existence of a marionette theatre is to introduce elements that are impossible in the legitimate theatre. Consider the features of the ugly countess in 'The Rose and the Ring,' and how they become suddenly and magically beautiful. And, of course, every one likes animals. Sometimes I think my animals are my most successful actors—Ali Baba's donkey and Rip's dog Wolf." It is also possible for a Tony Sarg puppet (feminine) to stage an excessively lively dance—so lively, as a matter of prudish fact, that a Boston critic recently shuddered in newspaper print and called indignantly for a show of censorship.

Three weeks ahead of the company goes their billing, handsome sheets and posters personally prepared by Mr. Sarg, who knows pretty well by now what manner of illustration will fetch his public to the playhouse. For the rest, it is in the hands of his booking department, since the producer does not travel with his show. The fact that he does not is occasionally a matter of concern to the outlying public, and now and again an Iowa club committee (having been incited, says Mr. Sarg's agent, by a rival troupe) will wire anxiously to know if they are seeing a No. 1 company. If so, where, they ask, is Mr. Sarg? The two secretaries who are kept reasonably busy in the New York office have a standard reply to that query: "Mr. Belasco produces a number of plays, and let us know when you hear of him starring in one of them." It is generally accepted that Mr. Sarg has other things to do.

MR. METUCHEN COMES EAST

A CROWD of nearly four thousand people was on hand at the Grand Central Terminal recently on the occasion of the arrival in New York of Hubert J. Metuchen, the Los Angeles critic and wag temporarily without a vehicle, who was paying his first visit in two years to the Eastern centre of American things theatrical. Upon closer investigation it developed that all these people were waiting for some one else.

Mr. Metuchen before leaving Los Angeles had communicated with an acquaintance in New York, who had arranged for theatre tickets for him. Thus, upon arrival here, he was presented with tickets for "Strictly Dishonorable," "Fifty Million Frenchmen," "June Moon," "The Little Show," "Meteor," "Heads Up," "The Criminal Code," "Sons o' Guns," "Strike Up the Band" and "Wake Up and Dream," which were to occupy the ten nights of his stay.

A scout was sent to Mr. Metuchen early this week, on the eve of his departure for the West, to discover what changes he had found since his last visit and to secure his frank impression of the local offerings. Mr. Metuchen was, to say the least, furious.

"The whole thing," he said, "is a snare and a delusion, a put-up job to get the out-of-towner's hard-earned money. It's a sharp practice that wouldn't be tolerated anywhere in the world except in New York."

Mr. Metuchen was finally prevailed upon to explain himself, to make clear what had caused his anger.

"There isn't a show in New York that's actually playing," he roared. "Every theatre in the city is vacant and the ads in the papers are all lies."

There was, it is evident, a mystery here, but it was not long before it was cleared up. Mr. Metuchen, a gentle soul who has been leading quite a cloistered life for some years, had simply forgotten the difference in time between Los Angeles and New York, had thus neglected to set his watch ahead three hours and had in consequence presented himself regularly at the playhouses of Gotham at 5:30 each afternoon, simply to find them dark.

Mr. Metuchen was none too willing to discuss the theatrical situation in Los Angeles.

"Los Angeles what?" he repeated several times, probably in an attempt to indicate, in a joking way, that he had forgotten, in less than three weeks, that there was such a town.

"Westward the course of the Empire takes its way," he said thrice, each time adding hurriedly that it was a joke based upon the fact that Arthur Hornblow, formerly connected with Gilbert Miller, is now general manager for Samuel Goldwyn of the films and that Arthur Richman, once a Miller playwright, had been in Hollywood last Summer. (Oh, yes, and that Mr. Miller's headquarters are in the Empire Theatre and that the original quotation really is "Westward the course of Empire takes its way.")

Before dismissing the scout, Mr. Metuchen issued a word of warning to those who really have the interests of the talkies at heart.

"The legitimate stage is rapidly undermining you," he said, "and you pay no attention. It is stealing your best players (vide Lily Damita), your best playwrights (vide Max Marcin), your very technique (vide 'Street Scene'). People are getting tired of sitting in the same old cathedrals and palaces that the motion picture managers are forcing on them and are flocking by the twos to the palatial playhouses of the legitimate. If this continues, there won't be a motion picture theatre still standing in New York in another five years." H. J. M.

Editor's Note: Mr. Metuchen, it is understood, will continue to be without a vehicle upon his return to Los Angeles.

MOLLY OF SECOND AVENUE

An East Side Favorite Tells Why She Intends to Remain There

By ROSE C. FELD.

IT is really another world. The signs are the same but they're different, the shops have the same wares but they're different, the streets have the same kind of houses but they're different. Perhaps it's the language, which is English but different, perhaps it's the baked sweet potatoes and Turkish delight and roasted almonds which you can buy on pushcarts, perhaps it is the children or the bearded men or the shawl-covered women, perhaps it is the grown-ups in between who have economically and socially but not emotionally outgrown the beards and shawls. At any rate, it's all different, and that is the thing that keeps Molly Picon, Yiddish comedienne, on Second Avenue, where at present she is appearing in "The Jolly Orphan." She has been on Broadway, she has played on the R.-K.-O. vaudeville circuit, she has received offers which might have turned the head of a less sensible person, but always her loyalty remains with her own audience.

Quite likely that is the reason she is today the toast and the darling of the east side. In a manner of speaking, she is the east side. She has its humor, its sense of the ridiculous, its searching self-analysis, its sentiment and pathos, racial as well as individual, and its hard, good sense. All these things endear her to the people who come to see her over and over again, who recognize in her highly magnified or distorted humors the stuff which makes up their own lives. They are prepared to laugh long before she comes on the stage, they sit eager and expectant with the laugh waiting on their lips, and the moment her head or her shoes pop into the scene they go off into tremendous gales of affectionate and intimate mirth. And she responds to that greeting with a whole-hearted performance that puts to shame the most generous efforts of a Broadway actor. There is no stinting of values on either side of the curtain on Second Avenue.

In appearance Molly Picon is a bit out of place on a Yiddish-speaking stage. She is small and slender. She admits that she was more than a little afraid of failure when she first came here, knowing the east side's predilection for stars who weigh at least 150 pounds. Miss Picon weighs, one should guess, a little over a hundred. She is dark-eyed, dark-haired and electric. Her eyes are reminiscent of Eddie Cantor; in her manner she is a strange and interesting cross between Harpo Marx and Fannie Brice. Unlike these three, however, whose roots are quite like her own, she has no ambitions to leave Second Avenue for Broadway. As she puts it, coming back to Second Avenue after playing at the Palace was like coming home after staying in a hotel.

She was born in Philadelphia, Russian Jewish on one side, Polish on the other. Her English is good Philadelphia, not New York east side, English. From the very beginning the theatre called to her, and because her parents and grandparents knew only the Yiddish stage it was there she made her début. She was 5 when she first sang to a presumably enthralled audience in the Quaker City that she was "afraid to go home in the dark." She sang it in English, she followed the song with a Dutch character recitation and ended with a Russian dance. That started her.

In time she chose the theatre as a career and her family, though pleased at her local success, were more than a little ashamed of her making money at it. Proper Jewish families do not like their daughters to be actresses. They change their minds when the actresses turn out to be good ones, which possibly proves that their sense of morality is based on sound critical judgment. Certainly every family ought to be ashamed of a poor actress in its midst and it is part of Jewish tradition to be prepared for the worst.

Molly Picon made a tremendous hit in Philadelphia, but New York, with its greater Jewish audience, was the place, she felt, in which she really belonged. With the same good sense that characterizes most of her decisions, she came to this city by way of Warsaw, Bucharest, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, London and points in between. In other words, she went to the cities of Europe to become more truly Jewish and more truly a comedienne. She went to learn something of the life and conditions and the language of the people whose instincts and emotions and mental and spiritual lives she wished to interpret. For three years, accompanied by her husband, Jacob Kalich, who writes most of her plays and doctors those that others write, she toured the Continent and acquired the background which makes her one with her audience of today. Instead of taking part in the more obvious pleasures and pastimes of an American in European capitals, she dug deeper into the roots of her traditions and fused the life of the Old World which opened before her with the life of the new in which she had grown up.

"My husband," she explained, "is the son of a rabbi. His youth was filled with the tradition and ritual of rabbinical life. He saw its beauty and its pathos and its humor. Unlike many Jews who have been born in Europe and later came here, he never sought to break away from the past. To him that was vastly more rich and colorful than anything that present-day life could offer. What his reason could not swallow he discarded, but the beauty there is in Jewish life he has kept. It was he who opened new doors to me.

"During the three years with the Yiddish-speaking communities in Europe, I became saturated with Jewish lore and legend, with beliefs and traditions that I was entirely ignorant of before. I learned also how to speak Yiddish properly. Those who tell you that Yiddish is no language do not know what they're talking about. I have heard my own grandfather say, 'People have to learn how to speak German and French and Spanish, but Yiddish—you open your mouth and talk!' It's not as easy as that. I soon discovered how poor my own efforts in the language were. There are polish and eloquence and richness in the Yiddish tongue that are absent from the speech of most of those who speak it in New York. What's more, it isn't the same thing in Bucharest as it is in Warsaw and it isn't the same thing in Paris as it is in Vienna. It's as varied as is the English language. An Englishman speaks it with an accent different from the American and the Scotchman thinks the Irishman is unintelligible. The same is true of Yiddish. A Lithuanian Jew is certain that his Yiddish is superior to a Pole's and a Rumanian has no use for a Galician. Here in the United States we have still another influence. When a second-generation American child of Jewish descent speaks Yiddish it is usually with what is called a 'Yankee' accent. A 'Yankee' to an east side Jew doesn't mean a native of New England; it means somebody who has acquired the manners and mannerisms of Broadway and Fifth Avenue. Nor is it always a term of commendation and approval."

Miss Picon's trip in Europe was not wholly a self-instructive one. In each city she visited she played, and what the people of the Old World gave her in background she returned by giving them a taste of life in the new. To her listeners she and her plays epitomized the joy of existence in the land of plenty. Long before her name appeared in electric lights on Second Avenue, Molly Picon's name was a byword in the Jewish communities of Europe. When she returned to the United States six years ago, she came straight to New York and opened up on Second Avenue. Although she was practically unknown here, she filled the house the first night she appeared. She has been packing them in ever since.

"Jews have a resonance the world over," she said. "The work I had done in Europe had created an audience for me in New York. It was like coming home to old friends even though I had been unaware that I had friends here."

Last Summer she played at the Palace Theatre for several weeks and went on tour for several more. She was not particularly happy in the field, although it meant more money than she makes on Second Avenue and a greater reputation with a wider audience.

"Something was missing, but it wasn't the audience," she said with a wide smile. "All the east side came to the Palace with me and filled the house from box to gallery. They weren't going to see me 'flop' before the Goyim (Gentiles). It was very funny. The Palace management said it had never had an audience like that before, that there never had been such enthusiasm and applause. It was my audience helping me to put myself over. It gave me confidence, of course. I felt I was singing to my own kind. At the same time I wondered whether I could have put myself over with a crowd that hadn't followed me. I wonder whether the success that was mine hadn't been brought uptown to me by people who made my career a successful one downtown.

"Don't imagine I am complaining about them. I love them for it. I should have felt terribly lonely and lost without them. The critics said fine things about my rendition of English songs sung in the King's English, and I was immensely pleased that I could put it over, but I know that I was most at ease when I came to the songs that had the color of the east side, the songs taken from the comedies in which I had acted. When I came to a Yiddish word in the lyrics it was like greeting a familiar face, and when the audience responded to that I felt really comfortable and happy.

"Our audience on the east side is a limited one," she continued, "perhaps 200,000 altogether. But they're steadfast and loyal. Once an actor becomes endeared to his public here he stays endeared. I know, for instance, that every play I am in is not the success I should like it to be. We do our best with plot and lyrics and music, but sometimes a play doesn't click. That happens on Broadway over and over again. What happens to a star on Broadway when a play fails to go over? He's out. That doesn't happen here. However poor the play is, I am not panned. The audience and I go on clicking. They will make excuses for me, they'll say the play was a poor vehicle, they'll lie to the last breath and blame everybody but me for the dearth of entertainment they may get. I belong to them and nothing I do can be wrong. That is not my conceit; it is theirs. And it is exactly this which makes me respond to them in a way I never could with a more reticent group, a group in which I felt myself an alien.

"There's more in it than that. The Yiddish stage has a future and I want to be part of it. Strictly speaking, the Yiddish stage in America is only about fifty years old. Its past has not been very glorious. The men who gave it dignity are comparatively recent, men like Gordin, Adler, Kessler, Mogulescu. Prior to them, the theatre was cheap and shoddy and amateurish. Today it is taking on the stride of the Broadway theatre. We are getting better plays, presenting them with the same care and expense that a Broadway production gets. We are getting for the Yiddish stage the same sort of artistic expression that the theatre is getting the world over. That we have the talent is known. After all, the Jolsons, the Jessels, the Cantors, the Gershwins and the Ben-Amis had their beginnings here."

All of the songs she sings, Miss Picon writes herself. All of the comedy "business" is her own. She molds her material to suit her audience and she never forgets that besides the successful Jew who has "arrived" she also has the Old World Jew who has not and the children of both who are to be her audience of the future. For the last she has a special fondness.

"Some time ago," she relates apropos of them, "Mr. Rumshinsky, one of the managers of the theatre, upon being annoyed by the noise of the children in the lobby, chased them. The mother of one of them who was standing near by went up to him and good-naturedly chastened him. 'Listen, Mr. Rumshinsky,' she said, 'if you knew the way my child drags me to your theatre, you wouldn't chase her.' Well, I'm all for children who drag their parents to the theatre."

ANOTHER PLAY OF IRELAND'S CIVIL STRIFE

DUBLIN, Jan. 1.

STRICTLY speaking, last night must be regarded as belonging to 1929, but when it comes to making theatrical history, the première of "Dark Isle," which took place at the Abbey about three hours before the advent of the new year, must be credited to 1930. Some two years ago Charles Brosnan gave us, in the one-act play, "Before Midnight," a vivid study in characterization and an equally telling picture of those sinister conditions which occasionally assert their existence in even the best regulated cities. This little play encouraged us to believe that Mr. Brosnan would later give us drama of the arresting kind. He has not quite fulfilled this promise in "Dark Isle," but he has made significant progress as a playwright.

The "Dark Isle," of course, is Ireland, and Mr. Brosnan has thrown onto the stage a group of characters such as were to be found in any village or town of the country during the earlier stages of the Anglo-Irish struggle. There is the priest who has seen service as a British Army chaplain during the great war and who regards the efforts of Sinn Fein as mere "idiotic nonsense." He finds support in an old adherent of the displaced Irish Parliamentary party whose son is prominent in the Irish Republican Army and is "on active service" as a member of the Flying Column. In contrast to this old man is a former Fenian, James Gannon, who is heart and soul with the movement, while his wife looks after the business and, "war or no war," holds that people must live. The scenes between these principals tend to become argumentative, while the minor characters provide an underplot of intrigue which occasionally and always at the right moment establishes contact with the debate.

The first act closes with the news of the arrest and acquittal of Michael O'Neale, the Sinn Fein leader, for the "murder" of one Simon Ring. This circumstance immediately places him under suspicion throughout the neighborhood and when an attack is to be made on the local police station he is wrongly informed of the time. The priest makes a vain effort to wipe out the "patriotism" of his parish by describing with great vividness the horrors of war, and disposes of the Anglo-Irish struggle as nothing better than a defiance of "law and order." Angered by the prospect of having everything spoiled by the eloquence of the priest, whose authority goes far, Michael breaks away and rejoins his comrades with a new fervor. Then come the "Black and Tans," and their activities bring about a complete change of heart in everybody. Even James Gannon, whose son has been killed in a "reprisal," casts aside his belief in constitutional methods and, snatching a rifle, goes forth to join the Flying Column. Father Clennon, too, is unable to stomach the "Tans," and, his patriotism aroused, announces his intention of praying that Irish grit may overcome British might.

Terrific fighting takes place close by and a wounded and dying Sinn Feiner is brought in. He confesses to the murder of Ring and to having misled Michael as to the time of the attack on the police station. His motive is also disclosed in that he loved the girl who was partial to Michael. The play ends in the establishment of complete unity, and as the curtain falls Father Clennon departs hurriedly, with the apparent intention of "doing his bit."

Once more, Mr. Brosnan has given evidence of possessing the power of characterization, although his people in "Dark Isle" appear to have taken matters into their own hands. As a result, they run a bit wild and talk too much. There is in this, however, a suggestion of the Irish tendency to be dogmatic when it comes to expressing views on matters of national political import. It is especially true in rural districts, where every man is convinced that he and he alone possesses the solution of such problems. Such dogmatists rarely quarrel with those who differ from them. They merely give their opinions and remain unconvinced as to the opposite point of view. Considered in this light, "Dark Isle" is not so much a study of dramatic events as it is a study of the complex Irish character which baffles even ourselves.

Mr. Brosnan has written a good first act. If he sets to work and grapples with his characters, compelling them at least to remain within the picture, "Dark Isle," which was well received, will be lifted into the category of works which deserve success.

THE POET LAUREATE AS PLAYWRIGHT

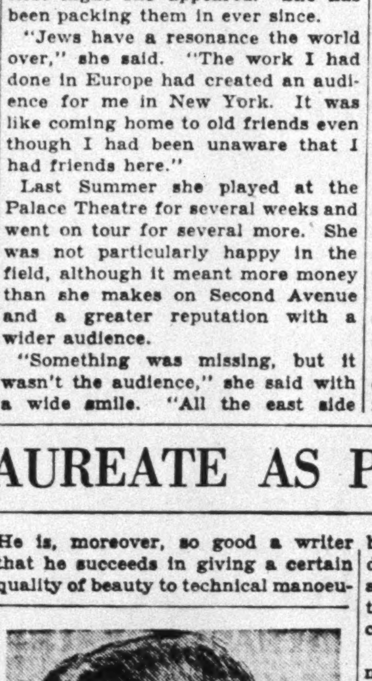
most obvious, and I am inclined to add the least important, of the means that M. Bernard employs to make Philippe a protagonist in his drama.

Philippe exists for us in the mind of Marie-Louise and it is M. Bernard's whole purpose to make us see him reflected in her. And yet, not only is Philippe absent from the stage but he is very little spoken of by any of the characters except in the opening scene. Thereafter, we are made sharers in Marie-Louise's thoughts of him by the subtlest means—by our knowledge, for example, that he is in the Argentine and by observing the effect upon Marie-Louise of helping her small son with a geography lesson, in which the Argentine is mentioned, a lesson which she at once supplements with her poetic and ecstatic imagining of this foreign and romanticized countryside. M. Bernard's technical and manipulative skill is extraordinary. He is, moreover, so good a writer that he succeeds in giving a certain quality of beauty to technical manoeuvres. But it is impossible to go further than that in praise of the play. M. Bernard has been obsessed by his mechanism; he has invented difficulties for the joy that every artist finds in overcoming them; and the effect of his play is that of a coldly brilliant tour de force.



Josephine Wilson.

There is a sister of Marie-Louise's named Jacquelin, who, being a minor character and therefore relatively independent of M. Bernard's intellectual pattern, has a vivacity, a natural humanity unmatched elsewhere in the play, and the part is brilliantly performed by Gabrielle Casartelli, a young actress who is rapidly coming to the front. The study of Marie-Louise is far more difficult and Josephine Wilson undertakes it with real courage and intelligence. The woman is a dramatist's puppet, an illustration of his intellectual theme, and no acting can make her anything else; but Miss Wilson, by employing a style which, if applied to a more human part, might be called affected, does succeed in investing her with beauty and in maintaining a continuous interest in the development of her illusion.

THOSE APPALLING YARNS

Stories of Many Well Directed and Ably Acted Films Are Millstones

By MORDAUNT HALL.

ACOUSTICAL experts have succeeded in imparting a lifelike tone to the voices from the screen; actors are becoming accustomed to facing the microphone without apparent nervousness and directors are doing well in the blending of sounds and shadows. But what's lacking most of the time is a story; one that is logical; one that possesses suspense and does not cater flagrantly to box-office appeal. In most instances the audible picture stories, as in the case of the silent films, are innocuous specimens of the special screen tales, or butchered novels or plays, which produce a soporific effect rather than an entertainment.

It is pleasant to doze off in a cinema and feel that instead of missing anything one is escaping a phase of mental torture. If some producers went out of their way to make films that would send spectators to sleep they could not do better than they have done in some of the recent productions. They might even exploit their wares as being guaranteed to produce somnolence in ten minutes, at most, even though one may have slept the sleep of the just for eight full hours the night before. One could then enter these theatres, flop down in a comfortable seat and soon be in the arms of Morpheus. True, what might send one man to sleep might possibly keep another awake, so the filmmakers might have to determine which productions were most conducive to slumber for the majority of patrons. Producers could issue the films in silent or sound form, for low voices would probably not keep many people awake, so long as the yarn was vapid, and patrons in discussing the soporific shadows might be heard to say:

"I had a most delightful forty winks or so at the Middletown."

Another might declare:

"I have never slept so well as I did through that Haines production."

Still another might aver:

"It's the rhythm of the dancing girls together with the green blues and the charming pinks that sends you to sleep almost before you bend your knees to drop into your seat."

Outside the theatres could be signs proclaiming the films to be the most banal and childish, "without the slightest sign of suspense or logic." They could refer to their efforts as being the despair of the person who wanted to stay awake and thoroughly incoherent, sticking to the staples of cinema relics. Money returned in case there appeared a suggestion of originality, could be advertised.

"Behind the Make-Up."

THE acting and the direction, for the most part, in "Behind the Make-Up" is quite up to scratch. William Powell is singularly fine and Hal Skelly is quite as good as he was in "The Dance of Life." Robert Milton's direction is imaginative and artistic, even though there are instances of a jarring abruptness in the action. The narrative, however, at the outset lends hope of being something original, something different, for it is apparent that it possesses striking contrasts and an inviting theme. It begins in a racy fashion, then halts or dawdles along and in the end limps out dejected and abashed.

It seems as though the author were trying to spar to keep Hap Brown, a vaudeville performer, away from Marie, the attractive girl, as long as possible, and then in the end there appears to be an effort to make amends for all the sorry treatment of Hap.

Hap is a numbskull and, seeing that he is a man of a certain age, it is fairly sure that he is just as much of a numbskull when the author decides to give him the girl as he was while the author was marrying off the girl to Gardoni (Mr. Powell) and otherwise causing Hap many a moment of sorrow.

The story is weakened chiefly through Hap's idiotic conduct. He discovers that Gardoni is having an affair with an alluring brunette and instead of telling Marie he decides to whitewash his rival. Hap, even at the last, when Gardoni has ended his ignominious career by committing suicide in a convenient river, goes to absurd lengths to have Marie worship the memory of her faithless spouse. Having Gardoni drown himself is merely an easy way out for the author, for at the time of his death he had a far better chance of success, in spite of the money he had lost, than when he started only a year or so before in the film. He had been accustomed to hard knocks and there is no reason why he should not be a logical villain to the last.

Hap, who is an exponent, before the footlights, of hokum, appears to have basked so long in the reflected brilliance of Gardoni that he is able to be strangely clever at the end. It is all a muddle in the last chapter, Mr. Milton restraining himself when he comes to the last scene. Here he turns his camera on Hap, on the stage, and then on Marie in an orchestra seat of the theatre. The girl is smiling wistfully, lovingly, perhaps, and one knows, even without a violent embrace, that Mrs. Gardoni is going to be Mrs. Brown ere long.

It is a capital idea—having one performer representing hokum and the other wit and brilliance, and then putting the two men together as partners on the stage with the hope that the lowbrow may be lifted up by the highbrow and that the highbrow be brought down from his mental perch by the lowbrow and thus a happy medium struck. And if the yarn had been kept up to the excellence of this notion, it might have resulted in a film on a par with "The Laughing Lady."

There is, however, far too much sparring for box-office possibilities and this effort ends not only in killing the interest of the story for those who want a modulated common-sense work but also for those who prefer violence, stupidity and sex appeal in extravagant doses. It may be argued that thousands of people enjoyed that silly contraption "Sweetie," but it can be said that there were just as many persons who reveled in the intelligent tale of "The Laughing Lady." If the motion-picture audiences show a liking for both styles of story, why not give them the more intelligent production? Jesse L. Lasky said in an interview several weeks ago that motion-picture audiences were growing up. This statement came from him when the sorry "Sweetie" was at the Paramount, but at the time he made the hopeful remarks he was thinking of Maurice Chevalier's picture, "The Love Parade."

If audiences are growing up or have grown up, it is high time that they left the milk bottle for something they can sink their teeth in.

The Duncan Sisters.

ANOTHER example of able and even imaginative direction with a weak story is "It's a Great Life," an audible film featuring the Duncan sisters. One cannot but be impressed by the brains used in the picturing of this trite tale. In fact, the direction and to some extent the acting mitigate the banalities of the story, notably in an episode toward the close of the production in which is pictured a vaudeville dancer's delirious dream. This serves to cover the bathos that might otherwise have occurred with two sisters in a scene where one of them is ill.

In the acting Rosetta and Vivian Duncan do quite as well as they have done before the footlights, and they are far more interesting than they were in their silent film, "Topsy and Eva."

"The Sign on the Door."

GEORGE FITZMAURICE'S audible picturization of Channing Pollock's stage thriller, "The Sign on the Door," is holding forth at the Rialto under the title of "The Locked Door." It is an old-fashioned melodrama, which, judging by the demeanor of some of the spectators, is not without effect.

William Boyd, the actor who portrayed Sergeant Quirt in the stage production of "What Price Glory," gives a strong, incisive performance. Rod La Rocque forsakes heroic rôles in this film to interpret smooth villainy. He is beheld as Frank Devereaux, who is always hunting trouble. In the end he flirts once too often and the man who goes to save him from being shot is responsible for this rogue's death in a struggle for possession of a revolver.

Mr. Fitzmaurice's direction is not without merit in certain passages, but in others a little more thought might have freshened up the story.

Wild Men and Jungle Beasts.

AT the George M. Cohan Theatre there is "Across the World With Mr. and Mrs. Martin Johnson," which is an interesting record of savages in the South Seas and of wild animals in their jungle haunts. This film is equipped with a vocalized description given by Mr. Johnson and occasional comments from Mrs. Johnson.

There are certain incidents that could have been left to the imagination, but there is no denying the effect of the sequences in different far-away islands and those depicting elephants, lions, cheetahs, zebras, giraffes and other denizens of the wilds of East Africa. Although a telephoto lens was undoubtedly used in photographing these animals, the scenes are none the less impressive, for Mrs. Johnson is shown in the foreground at times slowly walking toward elephants and lions, and, considering what the average person might do in such circumstances, these stretches are exciting.

Mr. Johnson's lecture is informative, if conversational. He is at first seen in an apartment where he is supposed to be screening his picture for the benefit of a few friends. Hence, he is not talking to the audience in the theatre but to those in the apartment.

There are more lions, more elephants and more giraffes shown in this record than in any other. Perhaps Mr. Johnson might have made his production even more interesting if his lecture were smoother, without interruptions by Mrs. Johnson, and if he had developed the incidents after the fashion of that splendid contribution, "Hunting Tigers in India," in which Commander George M. Dyott gave a clever description of the scenes.

This film, however, has its pride of lions, and the scenes of these beasts are wonderfully well done. In no other film have these lords of the jungle been seen to such advantage. They sometimes look docile, as if ready to greet human beings like a dog. They are beheld scratching their backs, yawning, sneezing and then snarling at each other in a spat over a carcass. The element of danger is brought out effectively when the lions approach the camera and are shot down either by Mr. Johnson or his wife.

Of course there are bound to be repetitions in films dealing with savages or the jungle, but it usually happens that such scenes are of sufficient interest to hold the attention.

Mr. Johnson has some remarkable "shots" of head hunters, pygmies and other savages and the black men who have especially long heads, due to bandages wrapped around them in their childhood, are startling.

"Up the Congo."

ANOTHER travelogue with an unseen lecturer is "Up the Congo," a series of photographic scenes dealing with the experiences of Miss Alice M. O'Brien and Miss Grace Flandrau. The lecture in this instance might also have been more effective if Commander Dyott's tactics had been employed.

With the reopening of Warner Brothers' West Coast studios, casting for "The Agony Column," the film based on Earl Derr Biggers's story of newspaper life, has begun. Claire McDowell, John Loder, Crawford Kent and others have been chosen for major rôles in the production.

The stage comedian, Gus Shy, will appear in some films to be made by MGM.

PROJECTION JOTTINGS

IT IS quite evident from the snatches of scenes shown in a "trailer" at the Rialto that Arnold Rothstein's activities and his murder have inspired the story of "Street of Chance," an audible picture which is soon to be seen on Broadway.

"Street of Chance" was written by Oliver H. P. Garrett and the production was directed by John Cromwell. The theme deals with the code of the gambler. Realistic "shots" of Broadway have been woven into this yarn. There is the circulating dice game, which shifts nightly from one hotel to another to avoid police interference or raiding gunmen. Footpads are shown lying in wait for the gamblers as they leave for a game, flush with winnings.

There is an all-night game of stud poker for high stakes, in which professional card players aim to trim a greenhorn who has just come to New York. Thousands of dollars change hands with the turn of a card.

William Powell, as a participant in this, is perhaps a film conception of Rothstein. He is generous in his monetary rewards to those who have served him, but coldly unforgiving to those who try to double-cross him. He is debonair, well-dressed, has a sense of humor, and knows all the news and gossip of the big street. And he is always intending to break away from his gambling career and go into another profession.

In this rôle Kay Francis, who has played various glamourous sirens, figures as a devoted but disillusioned wife of the big-time gambler, a smart woman of the world who wants her shrewd husband to abandon his disreputable companions, but who has seen him again and again unable to resist the lure of gambling.

Regis Toomey as Powell's younger brother, Jean Arthur as Toomey's recent bride, and Stanley Fields as a strong-handed Detroit rum-runner and racketeer who comes periodically to New York for some heavy gambling, are other figures in this cross-section of Broadway life.

"The Green Goddess," the filmization of the famous play in which George Arliss plays the leading rôle, will be shown here in March, it was announced. The film was directed by Alfred E. Green, and features besides Mr. Arliss, Alice Joyce, H. B. Warner, Ralph Forbes and Ivan Simpson.

David Belasco's play, "The Girl of the Golden West," will be turned into a talking film when First National Pictures adapts it on the screen. No cast has as yet been chosen and no announcements are forthcoming except that the officials of that company plan to produce it on a lavish scale.

Alexander Korda will next direct "Hell's Belles" for Fox. The story is an original one by George Grossmith and Zolton Korda. J. Harold Murray and Fifi Dorsay will enact the leading rôles.

The leading rôle of "In Love With Love" will be played by Kenneth McKenna with Joan Bennett in the main feminine part. This film, which Fox will shortly make into a movietone romance, was adapted from the play by Vincent Lawrence.

With television looming on the horizon, most film companies will soon be announcing the purchase of such rights to stories. In fact, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer does this in acquiring the sound picture and television rights to Arthur Schnitzler's novel, "Daybreak." Another bit of news is that this will be the first American film to be made of any of Schnitzler's works.

The final cast for Samuel Goldwyn's production of "Raffles" will be: Kay Francis, Ronald Colman, Alison Skipworth, David Torrence, Frances Dade and Wilson Benge. Harry d'Arrast will direct the film, the script of which was prepared by Sidney Howard and Louis Bromfield.

Production has been started on Marion Davies's new film, which will be known as "The Gay Nineties," an original story by Gene Markey. Lawrence Gray, who played opposite Miss Davies in "Marianne," will again appear as the leading male performer in this production.

In this film Miss Davies will appear as one of the Floradora Sextet. The other five girls in this group will be Lenore Bushman, the daughter of Francis X. Bushman; Patricia Caron, Ethel Sykes, Ilka Chase and Vivian Oakland.

Concurring with the fashion set by several other producing organizations, Radio Pictures will make their own revue, to be known as "Radio Revels," in which Bert Wheeler and Robert Woolsey, the comedians of "Rio Rita," will be featured.

NEW FILMS ON BROADWAY

LAWRENCE TIBBETT, the Metropolitan Opera baritone, is to make his screen début on Tuesday evening at the Astor Theatre in "The Rogue Song," an adaptation of Franz Lehar's operetta, "Gypsy Love." In this audible offering Mr. Tibbett will be supported by Catherine Dale Owen.

NORMA SHEARER'S newest talking production, "Their Own Desire," is on the screen at the Capitol. Miss Shearer plays the part of a girl whose parents are on the verge of a parting of the matrimonial ways. She tries to bring them together again, and in the meanwhile falls in love with some one who is connected with the separation.

RICHARD BARTHELMESS'S new photoplay, "Son of the Gods," in which he plays the rôle of a Chinese boy, will have its première at the Warner Theatre next Thursday evening. This picture is based on the novel by Rex Beach and Constance Bennett is seen as the leading female player.

TIFFANY'S talking picture, "The Lost Zeppelin," will be shown at the Gaiety Theatre starting next Saturday evening. In this story of a noted explorer who is wrecked in his Zeppelin at the South Pole are Virginia Valli, Conway Tearle and Ricardo Cortez.

A RUSSIAN film, "A Fragment of an Empire," is the silent attraction at the Cameo. It is the story of a shell-shocked war veteran who returns after the war to find a readjustment in social conditions. Fedor Nikitin is the featured player.

THE Fifty-fifth Street Playhouse is showing "The Last Night," a German film adaptation of the play "Revolutionshochzeit," which was produced by Max Reinhardt. Fritz Kortner is in the main rôle.

A FILM biography of Kaiser Wilhelm called "The Kaiser in Peace and War" is now at the Film Guild Cinema, where "The Wind," with Lillian Gish, also is being shown.

NEXT Saturday evening the Fifth Avenue Playhouse will present "Why Cry at Parting?" a German dialogue production in which Dina Gralla, Harry Holm and Vera Veronina have the main parts.

PRESENT-DAY travel in Germany is the topic which Burton Holmes will talk on at Carnegie Hall tonight. Motion pictures describing the lecture are shown.

WHEN John McCormack sings three more songs he will have finished production on his film. During the picture he will be heard in ten numbers. After the completion of the photoplay the tenor will leave for Rome with his wife and daughter, Gwendolyn, who played a small part in the picture. Following the visit to Rome he plans to go to Moore Abbey, his home in Ireland.

Victor Moore will be seen in "Dangerous Nan McGrew," the film in which Helen Kane has the leading rôle and which is being made at the Paramount Astoria studio.

LONDON FILM NOTES

Great Enthusiasm Abroad for "Atlantic," New British Talker

By ERNEST MARSHALL.

LONDON.

"ATLANTIC" has been called "the greatest talking film of the year" by quite a number of critics, both British and German. It has had a notable success in Berlin, where it had its first public showing, and repeated that success in several other German towns. It is now being shown in London, and will shortly be put on at a large number of provincial houses which are controlled by a British company. The Alhambra, formerly a well-known music hall, or vaudeville house, in Leicester Square, had to be acquired by British International Pictures and its associated company before "Atlantic" could be given at one of the leading theatres in the West End of London, as practically all the others had booked up American productions for the Christmas and New Year holiday season. Sir Oswald Stoll, who owns the Alhambra, wanted a very high rent for the hall, which was earning good money with its vaudeville program; and a good many people who heard the price Sir Oswald got predicted that the management of British International Pictures was, in common parlance, "buying a pup."

British International Pictures, and its direction, would seem to have been justified both in the courage of their production and in their conviction that one thing the British cinema industry stood in need of was a "shop window" in the heart of London where their wares could be exhibited to advantage.

"Atlantic" is by all odds the outstanding success of the moment, notwithstanding the fact that half a dozen tip-top American talkies are running in close competition with it in the immediate neighborhood. The theatre is besieged by crowds which will bear comparison with the biggest queues which have ever lined up for a transatlantic show. In some respects this is surprising, for "Atlantic" is not in the accepted sense of the term "seasonable stuff." There is nothing Christmassy or festal or holiday-like about it. On the contrary, it is a grim tragedy of the sea, which, less well done, would be rather horrible. It might easily have been overdone. Its pathos might have been made bathetic; its poignant interest might have been forced a notch too high.

Dupont, the Director.

A. E. Dupont is the producer, and he has fully equaled, if indeed he has not surpassed, the reputation he made by "Variety." "Atlantic" is simpler in its methods than "Vaudeville" was. Mr. Dupont would appear to have stopped experimenting, because he has found the ultimate rule of cinematographic art in direct simplicity. A London critic writes: "Though 'Atlantic' sank almost within sight of America, it will be interesting to see if the film gets there. Its technical work has never been surpassed, and Mr. Rosher's photography is wonderful." The implication is, of course, that American interests may be rather shy of showing a British-made film for fear of challenging comparison! It is not within the province of the writer to draw comparisons. It is merely his duty to record that "Atlantic" is an exceedingly fine production. It has certainly established Elstree securely on the map; whether Hollywood can do as well, or better, may be a matter of individual or national taste. A splendid cast has been got together, including the most popular artists in British filmdom—John Stuart, Madeleine Carroll, Donald Calthrop, John Langden, Ellaline Terriss, Franklyn Dyall, Monty Banks and Joan Barry.

The Talk of the Town.

It is no exaggeration to say that all the town is talking of this British talker. In fact, just at the present moment British filmdom is rather cock-a-hoop. A new cinema palace has just been opened near Victoria Station, one of the busiest "neighborhood-centres" in middle London. It has been put up by British capital, and it is proposed to make it an abiding home of the British film industry. Its initial program includes a screen presentation of the work of "The Cooptimists," a troupe of actors and actresses whose names are almost household words with the London and some provincial publics. The talking and singing of the production is on the highest standard yet attained in this country. It is not of the quality suitable for exportation, being altogether British, but it is confidently expected to hold its own against foreign importations to this country. New Era Films, of which Sir Gordon Craig is general director, expect "The Cooptimists" to establish their reputation firmly with that section of the cinema-going public which looks principally for amusement from the screen.

"Splinters."

Something along the same lines has been produced by British and Dominions Films and the H. M. V. Gramophone Company. It is called "Splinters," and had its inception in a war-time concert party which was famous all along the British front in France and Flanders. "Splinters" has been described as the British reply to "The Cock-Eyed World." It has been so well booked up in advance that seats cannot be obtained at the Capitol, where it is being shown, for some days to come. There are plenty of dances in the piece, and much is made of the "sex appeal" of the nimble-footed ballet chorus. The joke is supposed to be on the audience, for it is only at a late stage of the proceedings when the dancers tear off their skirts and hurriedly don tunics and breeches to repel a German attack that it becomes apparent these female impersonators are of the "superior sex." "No Hollywood revue has shown us a more presentable lot of extra girls," says one commentator.

All the bigger American talkers which figure on the bill of fare of the moment are known on the western side of the Atlantic, and most of them have had "a good press" over here. One of the most notable exceptions is Harold Lloyd's first all-talking production, "Welcome Danger." There are many laughs in it, but frankly it is rather a disappointment. Harold Lloyd is much better taken neat than when diluted with a tasteless Chinatown beverage mixed up with impossible ingredients.

Basil Dean has won no new laurels with the version of "Sherlock Holmes," for which, it is true, he is only partly responsible. It is little wonder that Sir Conan Doyle was for so long reluctant to allow his great character to "return" in this very unsatisfactory guise.

MR. TIBBETT'S OPERETTA

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER have taken an old operetta called "Gypsy Love," by Franz Lehar, A. M. Willner and Robert Bodanzky, which had wide popularity in Europe, turned it into a film which has been named "The Rogue Song," given the masculine lead to Lawrence Tibbett, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and will present the result at the Astor Theatre next Tuesday evening.

The idea which eventually led to Mr. Tibbett's becoming the first Metropolitan singer to make a full-length audible film is credited to Wells Root, a young man who formerly assisted in writing of affairs cinematic for The World, and who suggested that there was excellent material in "Gypsy Love" for a screen operetta.

Frances Marion and John Colton were engaged to adapt the old work. The Franz Lehar music was retained, with additional melody by Herbert Stothart, and lyrics by Clifford Grey. The task of directing was assigned to Lionel Barrymore.

Decision was reached to photograph the whole picture in Technicolor and to include an Albertina Rasch ballet of a hundred girls, who dance to modernistic music written by Dimitri Tiomkin, Mme. Rasch's husband.

Songs in "The Rogue Song" are said to range from operatic arias with symphony orchestra accompaniment to simple love songs and gypsy ballads. They include "To Live, To Love," "Once in the Georgian Hills," "The Narrative," "When I'm Looking at You," "Little White Dove," "The Shame Cry," "The Rogue Song" and "The Bandit Chorus."

Elsa Alsen, dramatic soprano, and a women's and men's chorus assisted in the musical side of the picture.

In the supporting cast are Catherine Dale Owen, Nance O'Neil, Judith Vosselli, Ullrich Haupt, Florence Lake, Lionel Belmore, Wallace Macdonald, Kate Price, H. A. Morgan, Burr Macintosh, James Bradbury Jr., Stanley Laurel and Oliver Hardy.

The songs were filmed in a specially prepared set of sound stages. The orchestra was encased in a thin shell of wood or horn in which were enclosed three microphones of different frequencies. Herbert Stothart listened to Mr. Tibbett's voice through earphones, as he conducted the accompaniment in the set outside. Voice and music were blended in the proper proportions in an insulated monitor room, where sounds from neither orchestra enclosure nor set penetrated.

A Tuneful Robin Hood.

Although, naturally enough, with Mr. Tibbett playing the hero's rôle, in which he is described as a tuneful sort of Robin Hood, riding at the head of a band of tuneful brigand followers, with the Caucasus Mountains as background, the film was planned to be musical, Barrymore announced early in the proceedings that the picturization would be made with the aim of keeping the story sufficient in itself to hold interest.

"What we were trying to do," he said immediately after camera work was finished, "was to tell a romantic story with music, not reproduce music with a sketchy story."

Scenes which are said to have been interesting in the making include episodes where the bandits ride over cliffs, a village festival, the abduction of the Princess Vera, played by Miss Owen, and her rescue by Russian soldiers.

Charles Dorian, Mr. Barrymore's assistant, is said to have had quite a time of it recording the scenes where the horsemen rode over cliffs at a fast clip, singing as they rode. It was Dorian's job to keep the microphones working to catch the music. And it further is related that a rather nice job in sound perspective was worked out in this connection. At least, the technical side of the studio is reported to be rather satisfied with the way in which its scientific apparatus worked.

Something New in Films.

Those responsible for "The Rogue Song" have referred to it as a beginning along a new road in screen plays; and this sentiment was repeated last week when announcement was made that Mr. Tibbett's contract had been made for a long term. Mr. Tibbett himself said:

"I believe that now we are seeing the beginning of the transition of opera to the screen."

GRETA GARBO TALKS

By DONALD HENDERSON CLARKE.

WHEN search for a suitable vehicle for Greta Garbo to make her first appearance in an all-talking film was ended with the selection of Eugene O'Neill's stage play, "Anna Christie," which is scheduled for the Capitol Theatre next month, best information is that the only person at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studio who didn't show anxiety over her official introduction to the microphones was Miss Garbo herself.

While the sets, which include the exterior and interior of a coal barge, the interior of an old-fashioned saloon and an amusement spot similar to Coney Island, were being built, Miss Garbo was learning her lines. And when the day came for Miss Garbo to walk in and speak the lines for the microphones she didn't rehearse a sentence, or even a syllable, to discover how she and the synchronized apparatus got along together. She merely walked into the saloon set, through a door marked "Family Entrance," sat down at a table and said to Lee Phelps, who plays Larry, the waiter:

"Gimme a whisky—ginger ale on the side."

Then, as Phelps turned to go, according to direction from Clarence Brown, she adopted what was indicated in the script as a "winning smile" and added:

"And don't be stingy, Baby."

Mr. Brown, who already had directed Miss Garbo in "Flesh and the Devil" and "A Woman of Affairs," looked up at the monitor room, where behind a sound-proof window Gavin Burns, the voice mixer, had been awaiting Miss Garbo's first words, which came to him through the recording system. Mr. Burns grinned and waved at Mr. Brown, and Mr. Brown went ahead then with his job of directing, which lasted for 850 feet of film.

Ten-Minute Scenes.

Miss Garbo had said she didn't wish to learn her lines by bits, but preferred to reel them off by the scene. The camera magazines carry 1,000 feet of film and the first attack of Miss Garbo on the microphones proves to be a fair sample, because after that most of her scenes ran for about one thousand feet.

Information is that many more persons would have been present at the first talking scene made by Miss Garbo if Miss Garbo had been willing. But she was always a stickler, even in the silent days, for having none but workers around when she was acting, and no one except those actually engaged in making the picture was on hand when she made her first reel in dialogue.

Miss Garbo had not gone onto the set unprepared for work in a dialogue vehicle, however. She; Charles Bickford, who plays Matt; George F. Marion, who plays Chris; Marie Dressler, who plays Marthy; James T. Mack, who plays Johnny the Priest, and Phelps, as Larry, all had been rehearsed through long hours by Brown in order to clean from the action the overemphasis of pantomime, which was one of the unnoted methods by which silent films got around the lack of speech. Miss Garbo knew her business and her lines backward and forward when she went into the first scene. But her insistence on playing the entire scene through without stop the first time the microphones were working was reported as being more than a trifle unusual.

"Anna Christie" was considered as an ideal vehicle for Miss Garbo because in it her slight Swedish accent would be entirely in keeping with the character she was called upon to portray. Those who know Miss Garbo know that she has a trick of wrong accent here and there, which helps make her the more fascinating, perhaps, to her admirers, but which does not make her a perfect model for English diction.

On the other hand, it is said that Miss Garbo's voice in the films has made everybody cheerful at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studio, and has resulted in the selection of Edward Sheldon's "Romance," the play in which Doris Keane has played all over the world for years, as Miss Garbo's next talking picture.

When asked about the slight changes which have been made in adapting O'Neill's play to the screen, Mr. Brown said:

"We adapted the story to the camera. Instead of mentioning the trip to the amusement park we took the principals to the park, and we showed old Marthy there again for a moment. It was good drama, and we weren't limited by the stage.

"We cut the last act from eighteen minutes to eight. And once the dramatic tension was finished we wanted laughs.

"The Best Anna."

"I don't know how Miss Garbo would compare on the stage with other actresses, as Pauline Lord, for instance, but so far as the screen, which is Miss Garbo's field, is concerned I am sure she is the best 'Anna' that could be imagined. My own opinion is that there is no one else on the screen who could have come anywhere near her in this rôle.

"I regret that it was necessary to change the original dialogue because of the censorship, but it couldn't be helped. I'd like to do 'Strange Interlude' some day, but right now I am busy fitting 'Romance' to suit Miss Garbo."

"Anna Christie," the original play by Eugene O'Neill, ran in the Vanderbilt Theatre, New York, from Nov. 2, 1921, to April 15, 1922. It was produced by Arthur Hopkins with Pauline Lord and George F. Marion in the leading rôles.

A BARRIE PLAY

CASTING which required a great deal of care was performed for "Seven Days' Leave," the talking screen version of Sir James M. Barrie's famous one-act play, "The Old Lady Shows Her Medals." Since the background was London, and the people represented were largely picturesque members of the lower class, 400 extras who looked like "cockney types" had to be procured for street scenes in which the star, Gary Cooper, appeared with the old woman who adopts him, the rôle in which Beryl Mercer repeats her stage characterization.

Hollywood was scoured to obtain atmosphere people with a London aspect. The 400 were finally engaged, a number of them having been born and reared in the British capital and all of them exhibiting experience at speaking the cockney dialect.

This, however, settled only a part of the special problems in characterization engendered by "Seven Days' Leave." To make it all the more lifelike, Richard Wallace, the director, wanted to include in this talking picture the novelty of registering the cries of the costermongers hawking their wares through the streets.

A search through the registration cards of thousands of bit players and extras was made by the casting department of the Paramount studio in Hollywood. This brought to light the names of five players who had actually served as costermongers in London years ago, and who knew the right cries and the proper intonation. The five were immediately cast for the picture, in order that the American screen public might hear for the first time such characteristic singsong calls as "'Ot potatoes, 'ot potatoes—warm your 'ands and fill your tummy, all for a penny."

In addition to looking typical, some of the "atmosphere" people had to be good fighters. The screen version introduces a rough-and-tumble brawl between British soldiers and sailors on leave from the war—almost the only fighting done in this war picture, which otherwise has only a couple of brief flashes of trench scenes.

Cooper was the only member of the cast who did not speak in dialect. Originally the rôle he plays was that of a Scot, but it was thought best to transplant the character to Canada, to give Cooper more plausibility in the part.

The four women who play the principal rôles opposite him all received their training on the London stage, in every case making their début at the famous Drury Lane Theatre. Beryl Mercer, who created the rôle of Mrs. Dowey in the original production of the Barrie play by the Charles Frohman company at the Empire Theatre during the war, was remembered by Cooper from a performance of "Milady's Dress" which he saw her give at the British metropolis when he was a schoolboy in England.

PARISIAN FILM CHATTER

Cinemas Play Safe With Two Features—The Immensely Popular Chaplin

By MORRIS GILBERT.

PARIS.

"WHEN in doubt, lead trumps." One hesitates to say that that rule is still a commandment of bridge. It used to be, although the professional philosophers of the game, who are active-minded gentlemen, may have discarded it by now. But it seems to be a fundamental principle with directors of French motion picture houses. As a means of filling their theaters, they follow it with great assiduity.

Readers of these dispatches may have gathered that cinemas in Paris are run very differently from those in the United States. There are, presumably, three different classes of houses here. At the top are the big boulevard auditoriums, drawing an international audience, and playing the feature pictures which may be seen in New York, London and Berlin. Numerically, this group is small. Next come the smaller higher-priced theaters, which also draw a heterogeneous audience, but make more pretensions to appealing to the intellectuals and the elegants of the city. In this group the "avantgarde" theatres, dedicated definitely to sophisticated, artistic and studious patronage, can be placed. Then come the "neighborhood" houses, big and little, sprinkled throughout the city, meeting the demands of the great general public.

Some of the big boulevard houses and some of the "neighborhood" houses have been considerably Americanized in the way they present their programs. They give continuous shows, interspersed with features, music, stage performances and news reels, just as in America. But the rest have not followed this example. All over Paris, "going to the pictures" is not a casual in-between-times diversion. It is a full evening's entertainment, comparable in time to the speaking stage. The audience arrives at 9 o'clock and the show is not over much before midnight. There is an intermission, the featured picture following it. Tickets are usually bought ahead of time, with all the formality and red tape which the French love.

It is in houses of this nature that the directors resort to the old bridge rule, "When in doubt, lead trumps." There seems to be much more hazard in presenting a feature picture in Paris than in New York. Many of those available are foreign, and France, a highly patriotic land, is torn between nationalistic sentiment, which might keep the public away from outsiders' productions, and the fact that there are not enough native pictures to go round; nor are all of them of the first quality. Here, the theatre directors have a trump up their sleeve in the fact that there is another picture to be shown besides the featured one.

Since the feature is frequently serious, what could be more logical than a comedy for the curtain-raiser? And in Paris, in all of France, there is no comedian so sure-fire, no trump so compelling as Charles Spencer Chaplin.

Chaplin's Grip on Paris.

In this brief space it is useless to try to convey the hold that Chaplin has on the French. He has been virtually adopted, since early war days, under the name of "Charlot." His ancestry, British birth, American career and individual artistry make him, for France, a universal figure, unique and almost transcendent. Philosophers and journalists here have written books about him, lectured on him. And the public adores him. That is why films of "Charlot" are seen every week all over Paris, revived again and again, and shown until the print is scratched and worn, shadowy, spotted and vague. Way out in the villainous Parisian suburbs, where audiences not only whistle and stamp but throw benches if the film displeases them, he is king. The citizens of Clignancourt, Pantin and Montrouge are docile as lambs, no matter how faint the reproduction on the screen, so long as they are watching "Charlot."

The agency here which controls the distribution of "The Gold Rush" and "The Circus" has rented each of these pictures in France approximately 1,500 times, and the demand does not lessen. There are four agencies distributing the earlier Charlot pictures from way back in the days of Mack Sennett comedies and the Essenay Company up through "The Kid" ("Le Gosse"). The record of distribution of these is amazing. Besides "Carmen," "The Gold Rush" and "The Circus" can be seen "A Dog's Life, "The Sailor" (if that is the translation of the title "Charlot Marin") and "The Pug" (if that is the translation of "Charlot Boxeur") this week. Some are playing at several theatres at once.

As an indication of the hold Charlot has on France, reference may be made to the bibliography of articles and books on Chaplin which appears at the end of the volume "Charles Chaplin," by Henry Poulaille, published in 1927. The bibliography is four pages long, and lists among the authors who have written about him such eminent French littérateurs as Jean Cocteau, Paul Morand, Lucien Fabre and Eli Faure.

The latest and one of the most interesting articles on Charlot, entitled "The Tragic Case of Charlie Chaplin," appears in the current issue of the weekly Pour Vous. It is by Alexandre Arnoux. Chaplin, like France herself, is faced by the cinematic fact of talking pictures. Much has been written about the comedian's intentions about the new form. Nobody has had anything more gripping to say than Arnoux.

"Imagine the glory of this actor," he writes. "No other man has ever had it so widely, so universally. His single personality covers races and continents; the Parisian man of letters and the African negro enjoy him equally. * * *

"To interpret our unformed thought, our slighted aspirations, our disasters, the simplest and most general means of expression is needed—and the screen furnishes it. Silent, its art crosses frontiers, suffers no translation. Besides, we are tired of words. They have served such unspeakable ends, wounding and poisoning more surely than arms and gas. Chaplin has shown that, if men keep silent, they can come to understand one another.

"What a tragic situation for one who has had such a singular career as Chaplin, for one who has given his name to an age—or deserves to have it given! If he speaks a single syllable he loses the audiences which are not Anglo-Saxon, and even in countries of English speech he discourages the friendship of those who have attributed to him the sound of their own voice. For we hear him always speaking through our lips. His power is that he obliges the spectator to become a poet, to invent the phrases which he does not pronounce. Every one of Chaplin's films has millions of articulate versions. Which is he to project? He will disappoint the authors of all the other versions—which is to say the whole world, almost to the last soul in it."

NEWS AND COMMENT OF THE CURRENT WEEK IN MUSIC

MECHANISM AND ART

Serious Problems Raised by New Devices—Injurious Effect on the Progress of Music

By OLIN DOWNES.

THE disastrous consequences of the installation of music reproducing devices in theatres and moving-picture houses apply equally to the practical affairs of orchestral players and to the art of music. Thousands of orchestral musicians are out of employment in this country and Canada; other thousands have abandoned music as a profession and have directed their energies into other fields. It is a very serious situation, not only for these musicians, but for art and entertainment in America.

Apparently the American Federation of Musicians, whom this writer has asked for statistics on the situation, is either without accurate information or inclined to be evasive in the matter. How serious the condition appears to it is evident from the very expensive advertising campaign upon which the musical union has embarked to awaken the public to the need of orchestras in place of canned music in our theatres. It is ultra-conservative to estimate that the number of orchestral players who have been suddenly deprived of a living in the last two years is more than 25,000. Fifty thousand would be nearer the truth. Seventy-five thousand has been the estimate of pessimistic persons.

Unquestionably the present low standards of musical performances in our theatres and amusement houses, which have been consequent upon the mechanical agencies, is due in part to the vendetta between the musical union and the employers of musicians. That vendetta is merely the transposition of the story that is retold by every industrial struggle in this age. First the individual worker, in whatever field, is abused and cheated by his master or masters. Then the workers, discovering that in union is strength, combine.

AT last they are powerful. They then set out, as the employers before them, to abuse power, take revenge on those who abused them, and thus fresh struggles and readjustments are necessary. In the case of the musical union versus the managers of symphony orchestras, theatres, moving-picture concerns, a wholly unexpected readjustment, with dire results to the executants, came with the invention and perfection of a new machine capable of reproducing or approximating orchestral tone with any degree of sonority desired.

From this moment the days when the musical union could dictate its terms were at an end. It is unfortunate that an attitude on the part of that union which became not only independent and self-respecting, but, toward the last, provocative if not extortionate, put even well-meaning employers and patrons of musicians into a defensive and then a resentful frame of mind. As soon as the new mechanisms became practicable in the theatre whole orchestras were discharged without ceremony. In turn other theatres and circuit organizations took advantage of the weakening in the musicians' ranks. Theatre orchestras were dismissed or cut in threes. Traveling attractions of various sorts giving entertainments, "acts" in special forms ranging all the way from operatic excerpts to burlesque, were commanded by the central bureaus to dispense with the already slender musical contingents taken with them on tour, or cut their membership down to negligible proportions.

SALARY figures of theatre conductors have been cut, and there is less incentive today than there has been for half a century for men to prepare themselves for careers as orchestra players. This condition, bad for the present, would be a worse augury for the future if it were not for signs and tokens that the public is at last awakening to its own injuries in the matter. For the quarrel of two large groups of people, and the greed of those who are always willing to turn any condition to their profit, at whatever cost to others, wreaks its final wrong upon the innocent bystander.

In this case he is the amateur or lover of music. And he is not happy. For his entertainment and profit (?) machines are substituted for orchestras; orchestras, where they continue to exist at all, are lessened in numbers, and there is every encouragement for a slack and poor quality of performance. The public is beginning to tire of this. It is becoming belatedly aware of the impositions practiced upon it in the inferior and third-rate quality of the music for which it pays the same prices as formerly it paid for real orchestral playing and other musical entertainment, frequently of a high quality, in the theatre. Already protests have been made, and are being heeded, in a few isolated theatres in the United States, and a few orchestral players have been reinstated. The one big moving picture theatre in New York City to retain a full-sized symphony orchestra and utilize its resources to the utmost is Roxy's—the more honor to it and him. In Russia the worker can command prompt redress in the name of the State. The protestations of such an artist of the theatre as Meyerhold in that fanatical community are heeded. In cities of England there have been outspoken and effective protests. Stirrings that precede a similar movement are becoming manifest in America.

It should be emphasized that these remarks are not made in behalf of unfortunate musicians. Sympathies of that kind should have nothing to do with the critical discussion of a matter of art. But it happens that in addition to the human equation the misfortunes of the musicians are intertwined inextricably with the misfortune to music. That is the matter at issue. The orchestras of former days cannot be replaced by machines with anything but a great loss of musical quality and effect. The machines still transmit music imperfectly—with imperfections so obvious that no ordinary ear can fail to note them, and immediately distinguish between the real thing and the fake substitute. The day has not come when anything like an exact and sensitive reproduction of musical tone can be contrived by the new mechanisms, and even when that day does come, the artificial process can never take the place of instrumental tone which expresses the personal, emotional, originative impulses of men and women. Why should a public with the tastes and purchasing power of ours put up with this "ersatz" music?

IT is not the intention here to disparage the great value, indeed the indispensability, of the reproducing sound machine in its proper place. No question that these machines will prove, for one thing, invaluable means of preserving records of the sound, the appearance, the technic of great performers whose art on the stage would otherwise cease to exist save in books of history and criticism. What is more important is the certainty that before many years little towns and hamlets remote from civic centres will hear whole operas and the entire orchestral repertory at the same time that they see the performers on the screen; and that, thanks to this marvelous means of transmission, the art of sound will be the common property and solace of humankind. But the province of the machine is not on that account to be misunderstood, or employed to degrade and corrupt the very art it is supposed to serve.

As a matter of fact, the beneficial change of which the symptoms have been noticed would come about in due course, unions or no unions, managers or no managers, economics or no economics, for a reason happily inherent in human nature. This reason lies in the instinctive preference for that which lives and communicates with the living to that which has neither life nor expressive power. The only thing that has made possible the recent substitution of machine-made for man-made music in our theatres has been the interest of the public in a new toy.

Delighted with that toy, and all the new games that could be played with it, the public not only tolerated but encouraged its use in all ways, bad as well as good, deteriorating as well as enlightening. Today, or rather yesterday, we were duly amazed to sit in a theatre without an orchestra, to hear sound as well as speech synchronized with action, facial expression and what not. It was also impressive to listen to an orchestral interlude performed by no visible instruments and marvel at the approximation of the instrumental tone. But that stage is passing.

The usefulness of the reproducing machines will not pass away. The mechanisms will increase in perfection and utility. They will assist greatly in the dissemination of the musical and dramatic art. But they will be relegated to their proper place in the scheme of things, and their operation will encourage instead of discourage the development of orchestras, the multiplication of operatic organizations, the substitution, at the right moment, of the human for the mechanistic element, and of the creative in place of the imitative agency where the art of music is concerned. Proofs of this tendency are all about us, in spite of discouraging accompaniments of a rapidly changing situation. They are found in the continually increasing popularity of orchestral music, the development of new symphonic orchestras, the increasing attention given to musical education and the gradual improvement of its standards, the numbers of new books about music, and a dozen other factors which tend to palliate and will sooner or later overcome present evils.

ONE has only to examine the past ten years in the development of music-producing mechanisms to discover which way the wind is blowing. Take, for example, the development and the effect of the records. At first it was only the records of popular and ephemeral music which had a sale. Today all record companies compete in the reproduction of the most serious music. The change that has come over the record catalogues in ten years is amazing. There is no period, no style, no form of musical composition which cannot be heard on a record—music ranging historically from the Middle Ages to the latest work of a Stravinsky or Milhaud. Everyman's library of music is going upon cheap and good records. Has the record harmed music or musicians? Obviously it has not.

Radio programs are now undergoing a like revision upward. Programs are becoming more serious. Costly as radio transmission is and is going to be, the bigger organizations are reserving radio periods, free of all advertising considerations, with intelligently supervised programs of fine music for the amusement of the public. The programs are received with growing interest, and also with growing discrimination and criticism, by the listeners-in. And if the radio diminishes audiences for certain artists at the present time, it also develops opportunities for other artists whose talents are not as adaptable to the conditions of the opera house or the concert stage.

Musical conditions, which suffer temporarily from profound and significant changes inevitable and indeed necessary at this period of human development, will ultimately benefit by them. This may appear optimistic, but it is not. Circumstances which may logically cause a pessimistic turn of mind on the part of a musician who has suddenly to find another job, and meanwhile support a family, or the manager who sees the market for his artists disturbed and adversely affected, or the amateur of music, who never will be satisfied with mechanical standards of performance, will eventually result in wider artistic horizons than we yet have known.

Sigrid Onégin, Contralto, Who Returns This Week in a Recital at the Town Hall.

ROSENSTOCK AT MANNHEIM

JOSEF ROSENSTOCK, who resigned a short time ago as musical director of the German repertory at the Metropolitan Opera House, has accepted the post of general music director of the National Theatre in Mannheim, according to The New Yorker Staats-Zeitung. As reported, his contract allows him "full powers," and he is to begin his incumbency this coming September at the start of a new season.

It will be recalled that Artur Bodanzky, the predecessor and successor of Mr. Rosenstock at the Metropolitan Opera House, came to his American post from this same National Theatre in Mannheim—a fact to which this latest interchange of posts lends an ironic touch. The paragraphs in various European journals that Mr. Bodanzky had been reappointed to his old post at Mannheim seem to have complicated the situation further and remain unexplained.

Mr. Rosenstock's letter of resignation from the Metropolitan gave his reason for withdrawal as illness, which in many circles was believed to have been brought about partly by much critical controversy over his conducting. His latest appointment, accordingly, has been interpreted in the article here quoted as "a vindication for the musician who left New York under sensational circumstances * * * and who was not able to overcome certain opposing forces during his incumbency at the Metropolitan Opera House."

The National Theatre in Mannheim celebrated its 150th jubilee last Summer and has had among its musical directors such well-known names as Wilhelm Furtwängler, now conductor of the Berlin and Vienna Philharmonic Orchestras; Erich Kleiber, the present general musical director of the Staatsoper Unter den Linden in Berlin, and Richard Lert, now conducting at the Berlin Staatsoper.

LEAGUE OF COMPOSERS.

NEW works for next Sunday's second concert of the League of Composers at the Art Centre will include a performance by the Pro-Arte Quartet of Belgium of a quartet by the young Polish composer, Jersy Fitelberg, which they gave at last year's international chamber music festival at Geneva.

Paul Nordoff will play Mexican pieces by Carlos Chavez, Edward Bredshall will assist him in Nicolai Berezowsky's caprice for two pianos, and Dane Rudhyar's "Granite" will be played by the composer. A new suite for flute by Wallingford Riegger will be performed by George Barrère.

The Liége String Quartet makes its American début next Friday in a special concert at the Hotel Barbizon. The players are directed by Jean Rogister of the Belgian Royal Conservatory, and include Henri Koch and Joseph Beck, violins; Mr. Rogister, viola, and Mme. Lydia Rogister-Schor, 'cello.

PLEASE OMIT FLOWERS.

RECENT BOOKS ON CONDUCTING

Review of Authorities Here and Abroad in a Special Department Of Orchestral Technique and Leadership

IN glancing through any bibliography of the works on conducting, the reader will be struck by the wealth of books in German and by paucity of such in English and in other languages. The student will be disheartened by the lack of suitable textbooks analogous to the works of Sevcik for the violin and Czerny for the piano. He will be surprised and gratified by the number proportionately which have been written by conductors, as should be.

In the last few decades, happily, there has been a rapidly growing realization that conductors may be first born, but that they then have to be made. From the attention accorded to the subject of late, and the publication of specialized treatises, it is reasonable to look forward to many more valuable contributions in the near future.

The three books of the conductor's bible (not to be taken ex cathedra, however) have been, and still are, Hector Berlioz's "The Orchestral Conductor," Richard Wagner's "On Conducting" and Felix Weingartner's work bearing the same title. Berlioz's work was epochal in many ways, but the student who attempts to follow literally his geometric diagram of time-beating is bound for disillusionment and puzzlement. Its great service was to state clearly the issues and the specialized musical and technical tasks of the conductor. Adherents of the conductorless orchestra principle cannot do better than read these three works, which also bear on the recent discussions concerning whether a conductor can improve a bad work by brilliant interpretation. The remarks in these classics on the power of suggestion of a true conductor may be compared to the recent discussions by eminent critics. Characteristically, neither Wagner nor Weingartner condescended to talk much of mere time-beating technic or the conductor's art.

IT will simplify matters to divide this survey into three broad divisions: history, biography and autobiography; theory and criticism; and education and technique. It is in the first division that the reader is most fortunate. Before proceeding to the modern works, mention must be made of a few rare volumes concerning which no serious student of the subject should be wholly uninformed. The first is "Battuta della Musica Diacharata" (Musical Beating Explained), da Don Agostino Pisa. Opera nuova utile, e necessario alli Professori della musica, Ristampate di nuovo, and Ampliata in Rome. Per Bartolomeo Zanetti, MDCXI." A second edition was published after the first. This 1611 treatise is one of the first in history to realize such a thing as technic in conducting. With this work may be bracketed Giuseppe Scaramelli's "Saggio sopre i diveri di un primo violino direttore d'orchestra (Essay on the Duties of a First Violin Director of an Orchestra), published by Weiss of Trieste in 1811, and Saverio Mattei's quaint and naïve "Sei di maestri di cappella son compresi fra gli artigiani," Napoli. ("Whether Conductors are to be Classed as Artisans.") There were at least two later editions.

The Germans also started early. Among others they contributed "Ueber die Pflichten des Ripien-Violinisten (On the Duties of the Violin-Leader), von Johann Friederich Reichardt," Decker, Berlin und Leipzig, 1776; "Einige der vornehmsten Pflichten eines Kapellmeisters oder Musikdirektors (Some of the Principal Duties of a Conductor or Musical Director), von Carl Ludwig Junkers," Winterthur, Steiner, 1721, and "Der Angehende Musikdirektor, oder die Kunst ein Orchester zu bilden, in Ordnung zu halten, und überhaupt alle Forderungen eines gutes Musikdirektors zu listen (The Apprentice Musical Director, or the Art of Training an Orchestra, maintaining order, and especially of encompassing all the requisites of a good musical director), von F. K. Arnold," Erfuhrt, Hennings, 1806. In 1878 E. M. E. Deldevez wrote "L'Art du Chef d'Orchestre," Firmin-Didot et Cie, Paris, and in 1888 "De l'Execution d'Ensemble." The Spanish monks were busy also at this time, but confined themselves more or less to ecclesiastical and liturgical works, which are somewhat afield here.

In the early eighteenth century appeared on the horizon Johann Mattheson, whose profundity and scholarship were at least two centuries ahead of his time. His theoretical works covered almost every phase of music of the time, and he wielded a mighty pen in behalf of those causes he espoused as just. The single work especially interesting to us among his sixty-odd is "Der Vollkommene Kapellmeister" (The Complete Conductor), published in 1739 at Hamburg. Of the few biographies of this great spirit may be cited that by Heinrich Schmidt, Leipsig, 1897, issued by the indefatigable house of Breitkopf & Härtel.

IT was not until 1913, when Georg Schünemann wrote his "Geschichte des Dirigierens" (History of Conducting), Breitkopf & Härtel, that any adequate sort of attempt was made to present a history of the subject separated from related fields of orchestration. The academic and weighty seriousness of the work makes the reader feel that the author would accuse him of lèse-majesté if he, the reader, were to experience any esthetic reaction from a perusal of its contents. The volume is invaluable as a reference source for incunabula and provenience, and still remains perhaps the most authoritative single volume to date on the subject. Other discussions in a meager list include Emil Vogel's "Zur Geschichte des Taktschlagens" (History of Time-Beating), Peters, Jahrbuch, 1888; Hugo Löbmann's "Zur Geschichte des Taktierens und Dirigierens" (History of Time-Beating and Conducting), Schwann, 1913; Rudolf Schwartz's "Zur Geschichte des Taktschlagens," Peters, Jahrbuch, 1907, and Adolf Chybinski's "Beitrage zur Geschichte des Taktschlagens" (Supplement to the History of Time-Beating), Breitkopf & Härtel, 1921.

The few discussions in our own language are either translations, mere tabulations of names and dates, or designed primarily for the general reader. In addition to Rupert Hughes's brief summary of a few years back, there remain for mention Wanda Landowska's "How the Orchestra Was Directed in Former Days," in The Musician, 1910, volume 15, page 233; Adam Carse's "A Short History of Conducting," in The Sackbut, January, 1922, and William Wallace's "The Conductor and His Forerunners," in The Musical Times, September, October and November, 1923.

THE list of biographies and memoirs is more cheerful. Perhaps the most fortunate conductor from this point of view is Willem Mengelberg. In 1920 Martinius Nijhoff of Amsterdam brought out the "Godenbock Mengelberg," a sumptuous volume which celebrated the life of Mengelberg in rhyme, prose and brush. Many of the most famous musicians, artists and writers of the day contributed special tributes. A recent biography is by Edna R. Sollitt, issued by Ives Washburn, New York. Hans von Bülow has been one of the favorite subjects for the German biographer. Some of the histories of his life include those by Eugen Zabel, Richard Graf du Moulin-Eckhardt, Bernard Vogel, La Mara and Marie von Bülow. Gustave Mahler runs a close second in popularity in the writings by Natalie Bauer-Lechner, Weingartner, Richard Specht and others. Pfitzner has also received much attention, notably by Benno Filser, Arthur Seidl, Kistner, Siegel, and in the collected edition of his own writings. Rosa Newmarch has treated Henry Wood, Paul Bekker has written on Oskar Fried, and so on. Toscanini is written on by Cozzani, Bonardi, Nicotra and Ciampelli.

As a general thing, and contrary to the accepted belief that musicians do not express themselves well in words, conductors have been neither chary nor diffident about writing their memoirs. Witness those of Walter Damrosch, Sousa, Dan Godfrey, Landon Ronald, Georg Henschel, Weingartner and others.

The palm for the most irrepressible and prolific of conductors of our time seems to be due to Felix Weingartner. One has to go back to the doughty Mattheson, or the redoubtable Richard Wagner, to find his peer in versatility in music and literature. Of especial interest to the conductor are his "Akorde-Gesammelte Aufsätze" (Collected Essays) which has essays on conducting in general and on conducting Liszt in particular; his "Bayreuth," which so roused the Wagner cult that a second "revised" edition appeared in 1914 soon after the first; his "Erlebnisse eines Königlichen Kapellmeisters in Berlin" (Recollections of a Royal Conductor in Berlin), in 1912, his "Ein Künstlerfahrt nach Südamerika" (An Art Pilgrimage to South America), his "Ratschläge für Aufführungen Klassischer Symphonien" (Suggestion on the Performance of Classic Symphonies), his "Symphony Since Beethoven," and, of course, his "On Conducting." These works, approaching musical questions from the point of view of the conductor, strike a new note in the history of the works on the subject. His "Lebenserrinerungen" (Memories), the first volume published in 1923 and the second in 1929, are characteristic.

General biographical data are contained in Arthur Seidl's "Moderne Dirigenten" (Modern Conductors); Carl Krebs's "Meister des Taktstocks" (Masters of the Baton), which discusses conductors by national schools and by groups; the late Adolf Weissmann's "Der Dirigent in XX Jahrhundert" (The Conductor in the Twentieth Century); J. Cuthbert Hadden's "Modern Musicians," and Dominique Sordet's "Douze Chefs d'Orchestre" (Twelve Conductors). Weissmann's work has some especially good pictures, as has Hadden's.

Critical discussions of the conductor's art are mostly limited to periodical and newspaper columns, many of them extremely valuable, but are precluded from citation by the limits of this article. Weissmann has written an essay on the apotheosis of the prima conductor in his "Die Entgötterung der Musik," which has been translated into English recently and which is challenging.

The theory of conducting has been treated, in addition to the cited works, by Berlioz, Weingartner and Wagner, by such frankly introductory brochures as Karl W. Gehrken's "Essentials in Conducting," Hermann Zopff's "Der Angehende Dirigent (The Apprentice Conductor), Merserburger, Leipzig, 1922; H. Kling's "Der Volkommene Musikdirigent in Theorie und Praxis" (The Complete Musical Conductor in Theory and Practice), Louis Oertel, Hanover; Cahn-Speyer's "Handbuch des Dirigierens" (Handbook of Conducting), Breitkopf & Härtel, 1911; Croger's "Notes on Conducting and Conductors," William Reeves, London; Corder's "The Training of an Orchestra and Conducting Orchestral Music," 1912, and J. Pembauer's "Ueber das Dirigierens" (On Conducting), Leukardt.

TWO small but exceedingly helpful discussions of a conductor's education as distinct from that of the theorist or composer are Franz Mikorey's "Grundzüge einer Dirigierlehre" (Outlines of Conducting-Training), Kahnt, Leipzig, 1897; and Walterhausen's "Dirigentenerziehung" (Conductorial Education), Quelle & Meyer, Leipzig, 1929. They attempt to present a curriculum, so that the apprentice conductor can orientate himself.

The most obvious gap in the literature on the subject is undoubtedly that of works devoted purely to technic of the baton and of time-beating. Perhaps this attitude is one reason why so many conductors are weakest in this branch of their art and call tedious rehearsals, all the while forcing excellent and routined instrumentalists to divine their wishes by instinct. Only a few introductions to this technic which are at all adequate exist, and the advanced student has been left to wander about to learn empirically. The list of beginners' manuals includes Adrian C. Boult's "A Handbook of the Technic of Conducting," published in 1920 at London, and used at the London Royal College of Music, which has some excellent suggestions; Carl Schröder's "Handbook of Conducting," Augener, London, still, perhaps, the best work in English for the beginner; Albert Stoessel's "The Technic of the Baton," New York, 1920, Carl Fischer; M. T. Cooper's "A Treatise on Conducting," Blackpool; and Adam Carse's "Orchestral Conducting," just issued by Augener. This last, written for the conductor of amateur and semi-professional orchestras, has some helpful hints on score-reading, practical orchestral acoustics, instrumentation and rehearsing, from the conductor's point of view, a helpful sign. The discussion of baton technique is inadequate.

LE MONDE MUSICALE of Paris has just announced the publication of a work which appears to be an important contribution to the subject, Paul Steffanel's "L'Art de Diriger." (Librairie Delagrave, Paris). At the moment of writing it has not reached this country.

Two very recent works, one on the practice and the other on the theory of conducting, have set a model for future works of the sort. Here at last have appeared the textbooks needed so sadly. Unfortunately, neither has as yet been translated. Alfred Thienemann's "Die Kunst des Dirigierens" (The Art of Conducting) is published by Bonness and Hachfeld of Potsdam and Leipzig. It is in the form of letters and forms part of a correspondence course.

Hermann Scherchen's "Lehrbuch des Dirigierens" (Textbook of Conducting), J. J. Weber's Verlag, Leipzig, is also just off the press. Here at last is the pocket companion of the professional conductor, for it serves admirably as a reference work to many vexing questions which come up continually during the course of practical work. Going on, as if by prearrangement, where the work by Thienemann stops, it takes its place as one of the classics on the subject. Nowhere else is there such elucidation of questions like beating caesuras, "cueing-in" various sections of the orchestra with different strokes, and achieving that tone-balance so important in modern works.

OPINIONS OF MUSICAL CORRESPONDENTS

Is Opera on the Wane?—Some Star Casts Compared—Coming Music Events

To the Editor of The New York Times:

IN your issue of last Monday Galli-Curci, announcing her farewell appearance in grand opera, knells in a valedictory message the death of lyric drama; last year Mme. Farrar, in a similar vein, issued a like obituary; and if we are not mistaken, Mme. Alda, leaving the Metropolitan Opera House, after almost a quarter of a century of service, for the radio, made recently a statement of the same sad nature.

If these three pallbearers of opera were some sour, disappointed singers whose ambitions were frustrated, we would hardly take notice of their jeremiads. But history and above all the records of the income tax department testify to the unprecedented success, artistic and financial, attained by Farrar, Alda and Galli-Curci in the operatic domain.

For the past fifteen years I have been connected with the promotion and presentation of grand opera on the road. And I feel better qualified to speak of the progress or regress of lyric drama in this country than if I were connected with the Metropolitan or the Chicago organization, both subsidized by powerful financial interests and fully protected against the fluctuations of public favor.

I can positively state that grand opera is becoming more and more a favorite entertainment with the American masses. Whether thanks are to be rendered to the gramophone, the radio or any other educational factor, it is evident that a well organized opera company, presenting grand opera in the traditional manner—I mean in the original text, with a good cast, a large orchestra and in good settings—can not only become a self-supporting touring organization but yield an appreciable return on the investment.

Grand opera is no longer to be considered the exclusive entertainment of kings, princes and financial barons; its success no longer depends on the large percentage of foreign settlers in a community; the heterogeneous and cosmopolitan composition of audiences I have seen at grand opera in cities like Reading, Pa., Boston, Richmond, Va., Daytona Beach, Fla., or Syracuse, N. Y., permits me to state that every element of our vast population, all over the country, is interested in lyric drama.

The French-Italian Opera Company, organized last year by the veteran impresario George De Feo, played this season to packed houses through Pennsylvania and New England, and in some communities, like Greensburg, Pa., where the total population does not exceed twenty thousand.

Independent motion-picture theatres, tired of serving the same menu to their clientele, day after day, have contracted with the French-Italian Opera Company for single performances, and Messrs. Dipson & Manos, owners of a large chain of luxurious movie houses, plan to give grand opera in communities like Jamestown, N. Y., Wheeling, W. Va., Steubenville, Ohio, New Castle, Pa.

The large film producing companies, Famous Players, Warner Brothers and Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, are already aligning forces to produce grand opera in "talkies." Several "shorts" ("Manon," "Rigoletto," "Faust") have been produced, and it is the general consensus of opinion that opera in talkies will come out much better than spoken drama. We are not betraying a secret by stating that "Aida" will soon be synchronized by one of the three above-named concerns.

Hundreds of excellent opera singers and directors are idling away their time in the expectant hope that some enterprising genius will find an outlet for their talent; thousands of local students are spending their time and money in the studios all over the country, preparing for an operatic career.

Is this the proper occasion for Mme. Galli-Curci, Mme. Farrar, or any other satiated artist who has served her time and filled her usefulness to exit noisily from the operatic temple by slamming the door in the face of all those who wish to enter it after them?

S. L. DEBALTA.

OPERA CASTS OF OLD.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

As a reader of your paper, I was much interested in a recent interview appearing in your columns with Mme. Alda, who discussed her retirement from opera to devote her talents to radio. What particularly arrested my attention was another of these references regarding the passing of the "great singers." Mme. Alda mentioned in particular the cast of "Rigoletto," in which she made her Metropolitan début—Caruso, Alda, Homer and Amato. She modestly did not include herself (at least, not by name). But where, she asks, could we hear such a cast today?

Caruso unquestionably was one of the greatest tenors of all time. But for the remainder of this cast, Mr. Gatti would not be hard put to it not only to match them today, but, in two instances, to surpass them. Let us pick up a 1930 NEW YORK TIMES and scan that small announcement of the week's repertory at the Metropolitan, and we find "Rigoletto" for some Wednesday evening with Mmes. Galli-Curci and Alcock and Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, de Luca and Pinza. Mme. Galli-Curci's Gilda is world-known and admired—surely superior to Mme. Alda's. Mme. Homer was and is a fine contralto and a musician in every sense of the word; but to say that Mr. Gatti could not today produce a Maddalena of equal strength would not be the truth. Being a lesser part, it is seldom entrusted to the top liners.

Caruso was, of course, head and shoulders above Lauri-Volpi, much as we like the latter. As for Rigoletto himself, Mr. de Luca is admittedly one of the finest in the world. I do not recall the Sparafucile of that particular cast, but I have heard Mardones, Mr. Pinza's immediate predecessor in that rôle, and I doubt if there is very much to choose between them. So just what actual accuracy was there in Mme. Alda's statement? Certainly the 1930 cast is better in two of its interpreters, unquestionably inferior in one and possibly another. If you add two and deduct two, what have you? You have just this in this case: that the 1930 cast is at least the equal of the 1908 (if that is the year). So why not admit it, even if your turn is over?

Isn't it possible, also, that our many and varied forms of amusement have split the light rays that come from the spotlight? Pre-eminence, after all, is a matter of publicity to a certain extent. Fremstad, Melba, Sembrich and others had the undeniable benefit of a full spotlight. Jenny Lind had a Barnum to whoop up her career in America. Public musical entertainment was then a one-ring affair. Today our whole entertainment system is a gigantic business with concert, opera, drama, movies, radio, burlesque and what have you all diverting and clamoring for recognition in hundreds of different directions. Galli-Curci has ten times the competition of the prima donna of twenty years ago.

Giuseppe de Luca vies not only with Titta Ruffo, Tibbett, Vanni-Marcoux and numerous others but with all the various forms of diversion, musical and otherwise, that we now have. All of which might be explained in this fashion: If you place before the public a dozen interesting personalities where before there were two (this ratio is certainly not exaggerated), don't you, by the very multiplicity of interests, lessen the chances of gaining for that dozen the necessary focus of attention with its resultant publicity? And surely this centring of public interest has much to do with what is known as "greatness." There are plenty of great singers today—the difference is that our ears have not or are not allowed time to hear any one of them as some of their predecessors have been heard. Which very probably explains Mme. Alda's yearning to reach more ears than she, of late, has had opportunity to do. L. P. A.

THE LATE MARK FONAROFF.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The recent passing of Mark Fonaroff, long a teacher in this city, removes from the profession of music one of those rarely unobtrusive natures whose greatness is permanent because it is without taint of personal ambition. There is scarcely an orchestra of high rank in this country which does not number one or more of the pupils of Fonaroff among its violinists.

Musical interpretation had, in the words of Mark Fonaroff, two requirements: "One must have something to say and the ability to say it." This quaint expression of his musicianship was equally typical of all else that he did. He was as good at chess as at fiddling and played the game with as great skill.

More than once a pupil of his had been the recipient of one of the great competitive awards in music. European thoroughness, exceptional judgment and fine taste caused him to be sought out. These and countless other facts in no way affected him. Indeed, he affected them, for they were the natural products of his manner of viewing life.

MORE ACCURATE PROGRAMS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

WITH the exception of the concerts of the great symphony orchestras, most concert programs are compiled in a very sloppy way, and I believe the critics should oppose this laziness. After glancing at a program it is frequently impossible to say what the artist is going to play. Often the scale is not a sufficient means to identify a piece, as the composers sometimes have written several opera in one key. No opus number or year or catalogue number is given.

It is amazing even to find so accurate and devoted an artist as Mr. Samuel going so far in this sloppiness as not to mention the part of the Wohltemperirtes Clavier from which the pieces are selected.

This makes it also extremely difficult to keep an accurate record of musical events and music heard.

A little more detail will not put a burden on anybody, as all the scores which the artists use contain exact information.

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS.

THE local orchestra pool is occasionally stirred by announcement of new groups seeking to interest the music patrons of New York. Foremost among these at the moment is the International Symphony Orchestra, formed under the direction of Dr. Vassily Savadsky. This new band will give its first concert on Sunday evening, Feb. 9, at the Forrest Theatre.

The International Orchestra is composed of sixty-five experienced musicians, among them Joseph Malkin, first 'cellist and personnel manager, and Anton Witek, formerly of the Boston Symphony and concertmaster at Baireuth, announced here as artistic adviser. The conductor, Dr. Savadsky, made his local début as pianist and composer on March 9, 1924, at the former Aeolian Hall.

Paul Stassevitch is to conduct a concert with eighty members of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra next Friday evening at Carnegie Hall, with Margaret Somme as piano soloist. Mr. Stassevitch, born in Russia, made his first appearance here in 1924 with the former State Symphony Orchestra under Stransky.

Edward J. Stringham, whose new symphony will be presented tonight by Henry Hadley and the Manhattan Orchestra at Mecca Temple, was born in 1890 at Kenosha, Wis., and served for some years as director of the Denver School of Music. He wrote his symphony while studying in Rome with Respighi.

The Roth String Quartet, returning from the Far West, gives its final American program Tuesday at the Hungarian Legation in Washington. The players sail for Europe next Saturday and plan to return here in January, 1931.

NOTES OF OPERA FOLK.

ROSA PONSELLE, singing her season's farewell in "Norma" at the Metropolitan next Friday night, will rejoin the company for its Spring tour to Washington, Baltimore, Richmond, Atlanta and Cleveland. Miss Ponselle's concert itinerary meanwhile takes her to Boston, Hartford, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Utica, Northampton, York, Rochester, Toronto, Flint, Saginaw, Cleveland, Memphis, Charlottesville, Roanoke, Syracuse, Columbus and Pittsburgh. She sails next May for a second opera season in London.

Vassar College, whose students have long subscribed here for a matinee box in the Metropolitan grand tier, will be the beneficiary of this week's special matinee of Massenet's "Manon," arranged by New York alumnae for the college's free scholarship fund.

Wagner's "Ring" as a major part of this year's "uncut" Wagner cycle at the Metropolitan has led Walter Damrosch to resume his lectures on the Nibelung tetralogy, which he first gave at the piano forty-five years ago. Mr. Damrosch will start Feb. 11 at the Town Hall, while a parallel series is to be given at the Steinway Guild Hall by Adele T. Katz.

Ralph H. Korn's "Building the Amateur Opera Company" has drawn letters of commendation from Mme. Sembrich, Messrs. Gatti-Casazza, Damrosch and Bodanzky. To Carl Fischer, Inc., publisher of the book, Mr. Gatti wrote: "If opera is to become a widespread and popular form of entertainment in America, it must be through such agencies as artistic and seriously directed amateur companies in provincial cities."

Father Finn and the Paulist Choristers, in their annual concert at the Metropolitan on Tuesday evening, will include an excerpt from Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Christmas Eve."

Three hundred of the People's Chorus will occupy the central floor as well as the stage at the Town Hall on Thursday for their "first intimate singing entertainment," thus giving the impression of "a musically cultivated audience able to sing artistically a program of the higher standard."

VARIOUS MUSIC EVENTS.

MacDowell's "Wild Rose," "Deserted Farm" and "Water Lily" are on Samuel Baldwin's free organ program at the City College this afternoon.

Four days' "Sea Music Festival," just ended at Victoria, B. C., will hereafter be an annual event there. THE DANCE: ARTISTS' HANDICAPS

The Growing Need of a Record of Composers' Creations for Later Dancers—Many Programs in Prospect

By JOHN MARTIN.

WITH the dance season entering on its period of débuts—a period, by the way, which now bids fair to contradict the early indications that it would be small and inconsiderable—one cannot choose but recognize that the dance is a very illiterate art indeed. This acknowledgment is no disparagement of the young artists, but rather an expression of sympathy for them that they must make their bows to the public not only as interpreters but also as creators, whether their talents and inclinations lead them in that direction or not.

The musical neophyte would not dare to make his début in a program of his own compositions; nor would the young actor presume to write his own play. But the dancer has no choice; if he is to dance at all, except in the ensemble of somebody else, he must create his own dances. Throughout the hundreds of years during which the masters of the art have come and gone there has grown up no literature, no répertoire, no record of the composer's work except in the doubtful medium of tradition. It is a desperate lack, this lack of a literature, and the complacence of dancers as a class is difficult to comprehend.

Some years ago Adeline Genée presented a series of re-creations of the dances of Camargo and other great dancers of the past in a program of rare charm and delight. They were, however, re-creations in the fullest meaning of the word—they could not even be termed restorations in the archaeological sense; for, though they entailed painstaking research, and the special knowledge and judgment of Genée were beyond question, there were many gaps that could never be bridged. Camargo would doubtless have marveled equally at the accomplishments of her successor and at the compositions Genée attributed to her.

Art That Is Preserved.

As a matter of fact, Camargo does not date into any remote antiquity. The works of her contemporaries in the other arts are preserved in great quantity, are performed constantly and are considered not at all as rare relics but are easily accessible and very much alive. Gluck, for one, was her junior by four years; the young Mozart had already begun to compose while she was still dancing. Bach was a contemporary of her teacher and predecessor at the opera, Mlle. Prévost, and Lully died when Prévost was 7 years old. In the field of the drama Goldoni antedated Camargo by three years and survived her by twenty-three; Molière had been dead thirty-seven years and Shakespeare ninety-four when she was born.

One need not go as far back as this, however, to point out the difference in recording the accomplishments of the arts. Where may one find the compositions of Petipa, of Nijinsky, of Duncan? What of the compositions of the leading dancers of today? Is it the dancer alone who is important, and not his dances? There are few who would be willing to answer this last question with an unqualified affirmative.

The condition that exists at present is extremely detrimental to the dance as an art, and, consequently, to all who practice it. New compositions follow one another in dismaying numbers, each to be performed a comparatively few times by its creator and then to disappear into oblivion. Granted that the majority of them should so disappear, there should at least be the opportunity of saving those with value.

The Dance Handicapped.

Modern composers in the other arts can benefit by the study of their predecessors' work, whereas the dance composer must start from "scratch," evolve for himself some theory of first principles, and go over experimentally miles of ground that have already been explored but not recorded by countless others. It is unnecessary to go into detail regarding the crudeness, the lack of polish, the insubstantiality and comparative littleness of vision which are likely to characterize works of art that ignore the past.

The plight of the young dancer is an even sadder one. Now that the old "ballet d'action" has passed, there is no such thing as a minor rôle in an ensemble production which may lead to a major rôle and thence to the premiership. A member of an ensemble in the modern style is merely a cog in a wheel, one of many whose work is more satisfactory to the whole in proportion as it is depersonalized.

When a dancer believes himself to be technically and otherwise equipped to become a soloist, he must leap at once into an independent premiership. If during his years as an apprentice he could have at his disposal a literature which would include compositions by the best masters of the past and present, and would not have to confine himself to the compositions as well as the technical method of his particular teacher, the breadth that would be his would be limited by nothing but his own capability and diligence. Imagine a pianist acquiring his education by seeking out a composer and working exclusively on his compositions!

In the days of the old ballets, a record was not perhaps so important as it is nowadays. Then there were a musical score and a libretto in which the action was clearly indicated. The actual dancing consisted largely of standard steps and combinations, and one arrangement was probably not very different from another. With the modern dance the problem is more complicated. There is no libretto in the older sense; the music, ideally, is fused with the dance movement and composed for it instead of for the libretto, and the movements are neither standardized nor even invented prior to the actual conception of the composition. Obviously every arrangement must be very different from every other.

There have been any number of dance scripts devised to meet the exigencies of recording the modern type of free movement. The arguments advanced against the use of one or all of them seem singularly answerable. It is, of course, a laborious task to record a dance by a system of notation, but is it much more difficult than the recording of a musical score? It is, furthermore, a task that is conspicuously devoid of any creative interest, for it is purely mechanical; but so is the actual writing of a play or a poem.

The Notation Systems.

If there is partisanship which divides the allegiance between the Laban system, Fischer-Klamt's, Margaret Morris's, Zorn's and any others there may be, it would at least be a progressive step for each to choose the one he preferred and trust to translators to do the rest. Moving picture recording obviously does not meet the same need as the more wieldy and economical systems of script, for the motion picture records the performance rather than the composition.

There has been a tendency always to scoff a bit at the practice of selling dance descriptions by mail. Perhaps it is a crude practice, but it may really be the forerunner of something more substantial and methodical. To describe a dance with words is, of course, wholly inadequate; but in so far as it tends to put compositions where other than their composers may utilize them, it is a step forward. Even mail-order "routines" at their most stereotyped help to make a dividing line between the creator and the interpreter.

There is really no reason at all why dancers should have to be composers and dance composers should have to be dancers in order to get their works produced. But until there is some sort of literature assembled, such a difficulty will apparently remain.

Harald Kreutzberg and Yvonne Georgi will repeat the all-Wilckens program with which they opened their present American season at the Craig Theatre tonight. This will be the first of four recitals there during the week, the others being scheduled for Tuesday and Friday evenings and next Sunday afternoon. Immediately afterward they will leave for Chicago to begin a Western tour that will take them to the Pacific Coast. They sail for Germany March 1.

Mary Elizabeth Gleason, a young American, will make her concert début at the Little Theatre tonight in Spanish dances. She will offer four groups of dances and the program will be supplemented by Julian Oliver, who will sing Spanish songs, and the Rondalla Usandizago, which will play Spanish music on native instruments. Milford Snell will be the accompanist.

Margaret Severn has canceled her second recital at Hampden's Theatre tonight owing to the unpleasantness of last Sunday evening when summonses were served upon the participants in all three of the dance recitals then being given. Miss Severn plans to give her second performance within three or four weeks, after the matter has been adjusted.

Next Sunday will present another case of acute congestion. La Argentina returns for the first of two farewell recitals at Town Hall in the afternoon, while Kreutzberg and Georgi are dancing further uptown.

On the same afternoon Irma Otte Betz will give an explanatory talk on the work of Rudolph von Laban at the Sutton Hotel, in East Fifty-sixth Street, in honor of Laban's fiftieth birthday. In the evening Agnes de Mille will make her first appearance of the season at the Forrest Theatre. She will be assisted by Frank Parker, diseur, and Warren Leonard, who was her dancing partner in "The Black Crook." Miss de Mille, incidentally, is to make a tour of American cities this Spring and has been engaged to dance in Europe next Fall.

La Argentina's second farewell appearance will be made at the Town Hall on the evening of Feb. 6.

The Isadora Duncan Dancers are booked to sail today on the Paris, having been recalled by the Soviet Government. The departure is somewhat unexpected, inasmuch as another New York performance was scheduled and a ten-weeks' tour of the Pacific Coast cities was already booked. Irma Duncan, their leader and teacher, will remain in this country.

Yeichi Nimura and Pauline Koner will dance at the Booth Theatre and not at the John Golden, as originally planned, on March 9. In spite of having been engaged for several revues, it seems Nimura has never reached New York in one. He was engaged for "Broadway Nights," but suffered an accident while on tour and was forced to retire.

"The Theatre of the Dance," under the direction of Dorsha, announces that a program of dances and "theatre pieces" will be presented every Sunday evening, for this its sixth season, at 116 West Sixty-fifth Street.

Hans Wiener's second recital of the season will be given at the Booth Theatre on Feb. 16. He will be assisted by seven members of his dance group and Louis Horst will accompany at the piano.

The current issue of Modern Music contains a symposium on the late Serge Diaghileff, embracing estimates of his life by Darius Milhaud, the composer; Andre Schaeffner, the critic, and Nicholas Roerich, the painter.

HIGH SCHOOL ORCHESTRA.

Plans for the activities of the 1930 National High School Orchestra, now in the process of organization, have been announced. The orchestra will play in two sections instead of one, as heretofore, giving public concerts in Philadelphia, New York and Washington.

Section A of the orchestra will play in Atlantic City, N. J., in connection with the meeting of the Department of Superintendence of the National Education Association there on Feb. 23-27, while Section B will gather about a month later in Chicago for the Music Supervisors' National Conference, March 21-26. Conductors of the Atlantic City orchestra will be Walter Damrosch and J. E. Maddy, while the conductors for the Chicago orchestra will be Mr. Maddy and Frederick A. Stock.

Immediately following the final program of the Department of Superintendence Convention in Atlantic City, a select group of 200 players from the National High School Orchestra will travel to Philadelphia, where they will give a concert Thursday evening, Feb. 27, at the Metropolitan Opera House, under the auspices of the Philadelphia Civic Music Association. The following evening, Feb. 28, the group will play in Carnegie Hall, New York City, at a concert sponsored by Dr. John Erskine, president of the Juilliard Foundation, after which a reception will be given for the orchestra members at the Juilliard School of Music. On Saturday, March 1, the orchestra will give a concert at the new Constitution Hall, Washington, D. C., sponsored by Mrs. A. H. Vandenberg. This will be an invitation concert, at which a large number of government officials will be present.

The orchestra group that will go on tour will be made up of 200 selected players who were trained at the National High School Orchestra and Band Camp at Interlochen.

CHORAL EVENTS.

The Society of the Friends of Music announces a performance of Handel's "Alexander's Feast" on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 2, at Mecca Auditorium. The soloists include Ethyl Hayden, Louise Lerch, George Meader, and Dudley Marwick. A Bach program on Feb. 9 will enlist the services of Harold Samuel, Editha Fleischer, Marion Telva, George Meader, Max Bloch, Fraser Gange, and Dudley Marwick.

The Oratorio Society of New York announces a program of early "a cappella" and modern choral music at Carnegie Hall on Saturday evening, Feb. 15. Marcel Grandjany, harpist, and René Le Roy, flute players, will be the soloists.

SUITS ARE IN THE LEAD IN THE SPRING FASHION PARADE

UPS AND DOWNS IN SUITS

Jackets Vary From Wrist-Length to Three-Quarters, According to Occasion

THIS year of grace 1930 will probably go down in fashion history as the year when the suit came back. And what a welcome guest it is! Looking back over the last decade, we are inclined to wonder how we ever managed to get along without it. For the suit is truly all things to all women. It is a type of costume which the American woman wears superlatively well, and it fits admirably into her scheme of life. The business woman welcomes it, for it means that she may be at once smartly and suitably dressed for her work—a matter which has been something of a problem of late.

The woman of many social engagements finds the suit equally acceptable, for a smart tailleur with suitable accessories may be correctly worn from 9 until 5 and eliminate several changes of costume. And to the woman with whom clothes economy is a necessity the suit is a veritable godsend, for several blouses of different types with a well-cut suit on conservative lines will take the place of half a dozen costumes.

Jackets, Short and Long

BOTH Paris and American designers have concentrated on the suit for the Spring of 1930, with the result that we have attractive types of all degrees of formality and showing great variety in fabric and design. There are morning suits, afternoon suits and sports suits, as well as suits for general wear. The débutante and the smart young matron will wear effectively the chic little wrist-length jacket, cutaway in front and slightly longer at the back. But there is no fixed coat length in this season of individual fashions, and hip-length, three-quarters and seven-eighths coats all have their advocates.

For morning wear in town many suits in covert and in hard-finish mannish worsted, such as sharkskin, are being shown and promise to be exceedingly popular. Straight coats and belted coats, cutaways, flares and peplums are all in these trim little suits, which, truth to tell, are rather a relief after the frills and furbelows of the feminine mode. Both covert and sharkskin tailor beautifully, and expert tailoring is an essential of the town tailleur. Dark blues, blacks and oxfords are in the lead for early Spring, but there are also effective greens, rust-reds and dark and lighter browns in covert suits.

The Cutaway Suit

THE smart little cutaway suit illustrated is of oxford covert, the wrist-length jacket being nipped in at the waist and fastened with a single link. The flared peplum is decidedly youthful. This suit is worn with a tuck-in blouse of white silk piqué, buttoned in the front.

Equally popular with this type is the more conservative classic three-button, hip-length jacket, without a flare, which may be either cut away in front or straight around. This may be worn either with a flared skirt or one with pleats in the front or at one side. The waistline is indicated either by a slight shaping of the seams or more clearly defined by tiny pin-tucks which give a decidedly nipped-in effect. This is the type of suit which O'Rossen has made famous, and which has increased steadily in popularity of late. At his recent Paris opening this creator of the tailored mode showed more than eighty versions of the Spring tailleur, which were enthusiastically received by American buyers. For wear a little later, when the weather is warmer, flannel jacket suits in gray or navy, either straight or belted, are shown by several designers.

Tweeds continue to hold their own in spite of the influx of new materials, but they show several new tendencies which distinguish them as of the Spring of 1930. While coarse yarn weaves and nub tweeds of striking design and color combination continue to be shown, they are largely relegated to the strictly sports suit, while town-and-country tweeds of more formal feeling lean more to the finer weaves and to indistinct patterns which give almost the effect of plain color.

Tweeds for Country Wear

A SPORTS SUIT of the country type was chosen for illustration, one with a three-quarters coat slit at the sides and the skirt slightly flared. It is of a loosely woven tweed mixture in grege and gentian blue. Gentian blue flat crêpe was used for the simple tuck-in blouse, a feature of which is the long scarf collar which is threaded through slits in the collar of the coat and tied in a bow at the front. The coat is cut with raglan sleeves, and has diagonal seaming and encrustations of the same material.

The short fitted jacket has also appeared in tweed this season. Coats of this type, like those of the more tailored suit, are frequently cut away in the front and left slightly longer at the back, although the straight-around jacket has many advocates. A fitted jacket and skirt of tweed are frequently part of a four-piece ensemble, for the four-piece suit has achieved a new importance as an ideal travel and sports costume. One swagger outfit employs yellow tweed for the suit, the many seams of its fitted jacket being emphasized with encrustations. Yellow and black printed crêpe was used for the blouse, and a coarse nubbed tweed in yellow and black for the topcoat, which completed the ensemble.

Where pleats are used on the skirts of tweed suits they are left unpressed, to give the effect of soft fullness, which is an outstanding feature of the Spring silhouette for all occasions.

Capes Are Youthful

CAPES appear on some of the more youthful tweed ensembles, both on short jackets and three-quarters coats. A clever model from Martial et Armand has a little cape jacket, finished with a wide belt at the natural waistline. With it is worn a skirt built with a yoke and swinging into a circular flare.

For more formal wear, in suits with or without fur trimming, we have a whole group of new fabrics on the wool-crêpe order. Some of these are heavy, some light. Several have the soft surface of knit fabrics, although they are really woven. Velour de laine, suède cloths, and some chiffon broadcloth are also used for dressmaker suits.

Peplum lines, bloused backs and slightly flared skirts seem to be accepted features of this type of suit, which is sometimes designed to be worn with a separate fur scarf, and sometimes has shawl or crush collar of galyak. Black and navy are the favored colors for the formal suit, some very effective models in these two colors being trimmed with white galyak. Red, green and beige, with collars of black seal or galyak ar also shown in peplum suits of suède cloth of wool crêpe.

Black chiffon broadcloth sounds a bit old-ladyish, but the suit which is sketched on this page is quite the opposite. Bloused back, peplum and tie front are decidedly youthful, and a blouse of red, black and white checked taffeta adds its own note of chic.

As far back as last August, Paris laid great stress upon the silk suit, showing formal suits with three-quarters coats of satin or faille for early Spring wear. Now we have the shorter jacket suit, developed in marocain, flat crêpe or jacquard, sometimes with trimming of galyak, or combinations of plain with printed fabric.

Lelong's charming suit of black flat crêpe and galyak is illustrated. This has a princess frock, with peplum of satiny black galyak, and a jaunty short straight jacket, which ties, scarf-fashion in the front and is bordered with fur. Such a suit may be worn as a frock, beneath a cloth or fur coat, for early Spring.

Another effective model in dark blue marocain has a bloused jacket with fitted peplum.

THE SHIRTWAIST HAS COME BACK

Blouses for Tailored Suits Show Tucked Bosoms, Linked Cuffs, and Youthful Turnover Collars

INSEPARABLE twins of fashion are the suit and the blouse. The renewed popularity of the one naturally means new designs, original fabrics, fresh colors in the other. This season one's blouse wardrobe must of necessity be a large one, but it may be charged to economy, for by varied blouses the same suit may be made to do duty for half a dozen different occasions.

An interesting newcomer is the shirtwaist blouse, which owes its importance to the vogue of the simple tailleur for early Spring wear. Many of these are tuck-in blouses, which take their inspiration from the design of men's shirts. Bosoms tucked and pleated, simple shirt sleeves with linked cuffs, and boyish turnover collars are features of this group. Despite their apparent simplicity, a trace of the feminine mode is disclosed in hand-worked details which distinguish many of the Paris models. One such had its oval shirt bosom made of narrow bands joined with hand fagoting. The fastening was formed of triple groups of crystal links.

Still another French shirtwaist blouse has a double bosom of silk, piped with a tiny band of contrasting color and having a hand-worked monogram in the same shade. Hand drawn work also is used effectively on a finely tucked shirt front.

What we used to call plain wash silk has reappeared this season as silk shirting and is being used in satin-striped white, pastel pinks and blues and some most beguiling candy-striped effects for the more mannish types of blouses. These may be sleeveless, or show cap sleeves or long sleeves with turn-back cuffs and links. Stripes are used horizontally for the shirt front.

Piques, Silk or Cotton

WIDE-WALE silk piqué in white, ivory and pastels also serves for blouses for the tailleur or for spectator sports suits, many of which effect contrasting blouses. Little vestees of white piqué, in cutaway fashion with pearl button fastening, are taking the place of blouses with some of the fitted jacket suits for early Spring.

Shantung, it goes without saying, appears in sports blouses, for this omnipresent fabric is used for everything this season. The younger set likes the tuck-in, three-button polo shirt, with cap sleeves and smart little stand-up collar for sports wear. Some cotton mesh blouses, both long and short sleeved, have appeared for wear with early tweeds and jerseys, and later on we are promised the real old-fashioned lingerie shirtwaist of tucked batiste, lace-trimmed dotted Swiss, broderie anglaise and handkerchief linen.

Amusing little dotted prints are smart for blouses with tailored suits of black or dark blue, and small all-over floral designs are effective in slightly more formal blouses.

Flat Crepe in Lead

FOR the dressmaker suit of one of the wool crêpe fabrics, or soft worsted in black, or navy, the Spring blouses are being shown in flat crêpe or satin, preference being given to the former. While sports blouses as a rule favor the tuck-in type, formal blouses may be worn inside or out, some being made in surplice fashion, with a row of buttons on one side of the fitted peplum section, or a tie fastening. Groups of tucks, shirrings, or narrow tie belts define the waistline.

The necklines of these afternoon blouses show many faminine touches. Frequently the collar is cut in one with the blouse and tied at the front or side, scarf fashion. The draped collar, cowl neckline and jabots and pleated frills are also featured.

SPRING COLORS A KALEIDOSCOPE

SILKS in a fascinating array of new weaves, colors and designs were presented in the recent showings of the manufacturers. Silk will play an important rôle in frocks, suits and ensembles for Spring, and consequently has developed new trends in line with the changes in fashion.

The colors are unusually varied. Never have so many had the right to call themselves correct from the fashion standpoint. Once the supremacy of black and navy blue has been admitted, it is difficult to say which color is the next favorite. In other seasons one or two new shades have been accepted by the smart world as of the greatest importance for a given season, but this year the entire rainbow is enlisted, so much has the whole fashion question become an individual one.

Not only are many colors put forward, but each runs the gamut of half a dozen different tones. The grayed pastels, muted tones which made a great appeal for Southern wear, are being rivaled by a group of clear light tones which are favored by certain designers.

Green is steadily increasing in importance as Spring approaches, and is shown in a whole range of shades, from the pale almond green for evening wear through the water greens, with a blue cast, and the vivid tones reminiscent of St. Patrick's Day.

The beiges we have always with us, and this year they are presented in three groups, the rose beiges, the rusty tones, and yellow beige, the first being the favorite.

Red was stressed in all the openings, as being unusually prominent for Spring. There is no one shade of red that is promised pre-eminence, for the yellow-reds share interest with the reds that have a blue cast, and the rich so-called fruit reds. In the red range also are the soft and clear pinks which are much talked of in accessories, blouses, &c., in combination with costumes of dark color, and which will also be seen in many smart evening frocks.

Gray, but little seen for several seasons past, is much talked of in Paris and was shown at all the fabric openings.

NEW PARIS HATS

Soft and Flattering Brims Featured for Spring

PARIS.

THE hat of the day is the Spring hat, and in Paris it has at least a hundred variations. Millinery materials, shapes and trimmings for the coming season prove the success of the style revolution. Hats have ceased to be smart and severe. They have become soft and flattering. Brims that were either omitted or too uniform to be noticed this Winter are the most important single feature of the new Paris millinery. It takes an expert to recognize them in many cases, because they are being treated in new ways.

Reboux has started a new vogue by taking wide-brimmed hats and using the brims for drapery and bows to produce a new hat silhouette. Half a brim is cut away at one side and tied in a huge bow by this millinery genius. She makes a modern Mercury cap by making wings out of the brim at the sides. She scallops, cuts and drapes other brims to make bonnets and toques that are intricately fashioned.

Many of these hats are made of supple felt, of chiffon-like thinness. Others are made of reversible felt, or straw with the two sides colored in striking contrast, so that when the brims are draped one sees the colors opposed against each other. Straw cloth and cloth-straw are new hat materials. Neora, or bogota, as it is called here, is the outstanding cloth-straw and has a highly lustrous surface. Bakou is again revived and the French milliners use a great deal of bengale straw. Filet net straw is a newcomer and is used to make draped turbans and bonnets. Crochet lace straw is a favorite of Agnès.

Patou Uses Smocking

JEAN PATOU is smocking the brims of some of his smartest Spring hats. This smocking is placed close to the crown at the sides. The front and back brim are folded back on themselves, and this, with the ripples at the sides, makes a most becoming frame for the face. Such brims are quite wide at the sides, as are many of the brims seen at other milliners. Wide back brims have passed out of the picture, and when there is a brim at the back of a Spring hat it is usually cut away in an inverted arrowhead at the centre of the back.

Maria Guy, who is having a great success, cuts her back and front brims into points in front and back and trims the front point with a bow, making it part of the narrowed brim at the centre front. Pink as a millinery color is being launched by this modiste in both lacquered straw and felt.

Straw hats in sunbonnet shape are being shown by Paris milliners. The sunbonnet brims are either folded back on themselves or ruffled. Marie Alphonsine is one milliner to show such shapes, and she also shows Mercury caps of felt, folded back very far at the left side front so that a large lock of hair and the left ear are exposed.

Green in bottle, medium and light tones is a favorite color of this house, and, indeed it is one of the most important Spring hat colors in Paris. Brown and red, in bright and wine tones, are two other important shades. There is also a quantity of black with white, these magpie tones being arranged in sharp contrast to each other, as in a feather toque from Agnès made of black coque feathers with a big patch of white feathers across the top of the head. The scalloped edges of this feather toque give it novelty.

Scalloped Brims

SCALLOPED brims are seen in all of the leading millinery salons. Florence Walton shows felt hats with brim very wide at the sides and narrowing almost to the crown in front and back, with edges scalloped all around.

Most hat crowns are shallow, particularly in front, and fit the head closely where there is a brim. Maria Guy pieces her crowns, using the dull and shiny side of felt to show the piecing. Some hat crowns she tucks across the top. Wide side brims are characteristic of such hats. Jean Patou places a ruffle across the top of some of his hats, and embroiders the sides of the brims, which are folded into unpressed pleats.

LeMonnier makes a striking Spring hat out of reversible black and white alpaca straw, with the white on the underside of the brim, which is wide and is folded back over the crown in front and draped in flattering folds at the sides.

Bonnets Are Featured

BONNETS, which are being extensively featured in Paris, are different from last season because they have decided brims, which are draped close to the sides of the head to recall the quaint poke bonnet of other days. Rose Descat makes many such bonnets of felt and places a band of felt across the crowns from side to side, flaring this band markedly over the ears, while the brim is held close to the head.

There are many flower-trimmed hats to be seen in the first Spring millinery displays. As a rule the trimming consists of a single large flower placed under a brim at one side or under folds of drapery at the left side in the case of toques.

SEPARATE SCARFS

SINCE many suits without fur trimming will be worn this Spring, the scarf, whether of fur or fabric, is promised a renewed vogue. Two and even three skin fur scarfs rival the single skin, and the classic silver fox shares honors with blue, gray, beige and black fox this season. Cross and red fox are suitable for the younger woman.

The two-skin baum marten scarf is very smart, and fisher harmonizes with black, navy and brown costumes. Scarfs of sables, both Russian and Hudson Bay, are also featured.

Fabric scarfs, whether of silk, wool or knit fabrics, are made in cravat style and frequently match the hat. Chanel's little striped woolen scarfs are excellent with the sports suit of tweed. Quilted jersey is used for cravat scarfs with hats to match.

Bloused Back and Tie Front Appear in Suit of Black Broadcloth and Checked Taffeta.

TREND IN SHOES

Classic Simplicity Prevails In Smart Footgear

SKIRTS are longer, but feet are by no means hidden. In fact, they are more important than ever. For longer hemlines are so many arrows, pointing to shoes perfect or not so perfect. More elaboration in frocks means plain accessories and the new bags, gloves and shoes seem to have achieved the ultimate in smart simplicity.

The favored shoes for Spring are of the classic types, opera pumps, oxfords and one-strap shoes for daytime and sportswear, pumps and open sandals for evening.

Within these limitations much variety of cut, detail and color is possible, but the result must be one of simplicity, for the ornate shoe is decidedly out of the picture for 1930.

For general street and daytime wear with the Spring suit or ensemble, kidskin pumps are preferred. This does not mean that many women will not wear suède, patent leather and combinations of materials. But the newest shoes are the plain kidskin pumps, with black the most important color, much brown being worn, and navy blue more generally accepted than ever before. We are promised many suits and coats of navy for early Spring and matching accessories are better than contrasting ones.

Hence the hat of dark blue straw or felt, bag of navy calfskin and matching kid pumps will be much in evidence. For the more conservative, the black hat and shoe continue to be worn with dark blue.

The Formal Oxford

THERE are several versions of the more formal oxford, with high heel and three or four eyelets, some in plain kidskin or suède, some in combinations of the two materials, or in kidskin and reptile, which are also suitable for the Spring street costume.

For sports wear, there is little choice among the three types of shoes, oxford, pump and one-strap. But each has a modified heel of solid leather rather than a high heel to match the shoe. Combinations are especially favored in footgear for the sports costume, and the pump or oxford or suède, with cap and quarter of calf is shown in black and brown for early season wear. A perforated oxford of beige with darker brown trim is smart for the beige and brown tweed mixtures which continue as popular as ever in suits and ensembles.

For evening wear, satin has come to the fore, being considered at the moment just a little newer and smarter than crêpe de chine. Satin pumps are being dyed to match exactly the latest evening frocks of lace and chiffon. Of course, much crêpe de chine and moire are also worn, and slippers in these fabrics are also dyed to match, except in the case of black or white frocks, where vividly contrasting accessories continue to be considered chic.

Where buckles are worn, they are tiny and sometimes oblong, or the shape of a bowknot or a crescent, and lie flat on the shoe. A little buckle of baguette crystals is very smart on a classic opera pump in black or white.

For wear with several frocks, a lamé sandal with fine gold and silver design, with the background dyed a pale flesh tint, is very lovely. Heel and straps of gold or silver kidskin, or a combination of the two, decorate many of the sandals of satin, moire or crêpe, which may be dyed to match the frock.

Shoes for a dark green net dance frock are made of crêpe de chine in the same shade with a buckle of emeralds and rhinestones.

A FLOWER FOR HER BUTTONHOLE

THE artificial flower industry is looking up since the smart Parisienne revived the custom of adding a knot of flowers to her daytime costumes, both formal and informal. This is not just any artificial flower, however, but one chosen definitely to harmonize in type, fabric and color with the dress with which it is worn.

Leading designers, including Germaine Lecomte, Chanel, Patou and Molyneux showed boutonnières with many coats and dresses in their mid-season openings. Patou's cluster of lilies-of-the-valley, worn with a suit of lily-of-the-valley print in white and green on a dark blue background has created a vogue for blossoms. His designs copy nature with amazing fidelity and frequently repeat the motif of the print with which they are worn. Gardenias and violets fall into the category of realistic flowers and are worn by the Parisienne with dark furs. Patou's spray of satin roses is also worn with the luxurious fur collar.

Flowers made of the same fabric as the frock, either silk or wool, are used to give a feminine touch to a semi-tailored costume, while Chanel does interesting things with piqué, to wear with dark wool or jersey dresses. A spray of three flat white piqué blossoms show natural-looking centres of yellow stamens and are bordered with yellow, blue or green. Piqué and lawn are used for clusters of red and white gardenias, with fat buds and leaves.

Patent leather flowers, stiff and flat in effect, have been introduced with ensembles for street and sports, and large flat flowers of fur appear for street and afternoon, and are even used on evening frocks. Lacquered cloth flowers in gay Spring colors promise to be chic with the Spring costume in navy, beige or black. A bunch of gay little yellow cowslips is made of felt, the flowers laquered on the inside, while smart boutonnières combining two carnations in different colors are made of lacquered cloth.

MODERN FRENCH AND BELGIAN ART IS BEING SHOWN

TEST IN APPRECIATION

"Painting in Paris," Third Exhibition at Modern Art Museum—Youth and Older

By ELISABETH LUTHER CARY.

THE Museum of Modern Art is now holding an exhibition that bears the title "Painting in Paris," a title of such limpid simplicity as to puzzle many visitors. It means, we note incredulously, precisely what it says. If this sporting accuracy of statement could become a common characteristic of title makers, what a noble profession that of writing headlines and captions would be!

The painters in this exhibition are those who are still painting—in Paris. It is true, and often has been pointed out, that many of them are balancing on the edge of 50, three or four are on the side of the 60s and one is nearly 80. The younger ones, however, the youngsters between 30 and 40, leave one in the air. Their years are but as a day in the long chronicle of art. How can we, brought up with the glittering centuries, know what they are worth, what they will leave with us when they, too, depart and are no more seen? It is a great gamble, a heroic test.

IT is a gamble also to approve the choice as the present exhibition reveals it, but one that this reviewer is quite willing to indulge in.

The pictures themselves tell the story of a plain, sincere effort such as might be predicated from the plain, sincere title. They tell the story of a group of collectors who are taking the rather serious risk of trusting their own judgment, or that of progressive advisers, in bringing together paintings that shall stand the test of time. They have no standardized merit system by which to estimate the esthetic value. From criticism they can obtain only the raw contemporary product. Nothing aged in the wood (apologies to all critics). Eyes to see with are all they have to depend upon.

A better showing of the contemporary art now coming into existence in that irritatingly superior town of Paris has not before been made in our vast home town of New York.

Looking first at youth, youth in its fourth decade, Fautrier and Miro provide the quickening zest of contrast. Fautrier indulges wholeheartedly in that appetite for mystery which belongs to youth and, carried into middle age, either evaporates or becomes childish unless a man of Blake's genius lifts it into the sphere of authentic passion. Fautrier's "Flowers of Disaster," another pregnant title, burn from molten darkness like flames pushing forward to destroy. Unlike the mysterious flowers of Redon, they wear no alluring aspect. By the side of the flowers of Redon they overpower that so-called mystic's careful costuming of mysticism by their grand young fury showing the naked heart of emotion. Mr. Phillips has done well to acquire this canvas, a first fruit of what may turn out to be genius and may sink into commonplace. First fruits should be assiduously gathered.

To discard allure is one of the honest notes of the day. Miro in his gay imaginations plays wittily, comically, with the merest hint of salutary bitters in his wit. The happy mixing of a superior sense with nonsense in his work recalls the quaint mixture of an earlier age, when Lewis Carroll stepped away from highest mathematics to write the immortal "Alice," into which stray shreds of an extraordinary learning were woven. Miro's dog and ladder and moon in wide heavens might have more to say to the astronomer than to the man minding his step in the street.

WITH Lurçat, several years older, but still in his thirties, we realize a more sophisticated atmosphere. It no longer is the free expression of the tenacious dream of one's beginnings, but a more calculated mysteriousness, not quite mysticism and overlaid with ideas and emotions contributed from without. His "Enchanted Isle," however, differs from his "Madame X" in the personal flavor of its design. The catalogue speaks of it as an excellent example of his "imaginary landscapes in which turrets, fragments of wall, tree stumps and wireless masts are moved about the stage in various combinations," and says that in it he maintains "a delicate balance between decorative order and a romantic sentiment for the unreal and antilogical."

The first certainly; the "antilogical"—not quite. Painter's logic, or, to speak more precisely, designer's logic, is all over the place in "The Enchanted Isle." Here are some strips of plank carefully portrayed, the grain of the wood with its characteristic patterning in the forefront, casting beautiful shadows on the sandy beach—a little platform with decorative lattice work in the middle distance, above and beyond an unfathomable sky delicately pierced with stars; below, and near, an ocean moving restlessly—quite a conventional scene one would say. But not at all. Mysterious, as the original reality would be, seen under the stars by eyes that naturally discriminated, that skipped certain details to linger upon others, that saw overlapping planes, that synthetized in order to fill one's vision with an impression of the whole. Who of us all has not done this, or the like of this, under certain conditions, in the grip of certain moods, looking out from the deck of a ship majestically moving under such a sky of night and stars?

Thus we have a natural translation of nature from Lurçat and also a logical translation, since the objects chosen and their relation to one another are just such as would create an appropriate mood, as would endow commonness with majesty, as would communicate an impression fused yet definite.

Concerning Gromaire, of the same age as Lurçat, there is less to explain, if indeed one has explained, in the humility of an indestructible optimism. Gromaire speaks for himself in heavy accents, without elaboration or suavity or alertness. It is hardly too much to say that Gromaire does not belong to this particular section of this age, a section in which is made clear the esthetic desirability of corporeal reduction whether skirts be short or long. Gromaire, although never bulbous, invariably is solid. One well may ask upon what meat this art has fed that it has grown so great. And, such is the effect of a prevailing silhouette, the massiveness of form in Gromaire's art makes it difficult for this section of the age to appreciate the fact that he is angles, not rounds; that he is not an artist who turns human beings into machinery, but an artist who introduces a human throb into his machines; that his color is not brutal but sensitive; that he is one of those gentle giants easily understood when Charlotte Brontë's fiction was at the apogee of its popularity, but out of the contemporary picture as a hero. He is none the less an artist of great power. Weightily as he plants himself upon the earth, veils of atmosphere form and dissolve about him. In "The Pilot" wheels move and clouds shift and a man with only a nose for a feature unmistakably peers with the eyes of a sailor into the salty distance. All the realities are there, but Gromaire is doing his duty by his art in fortifying it with synthesis.

IN the catalogue several influences are assigned to Gromaire: Rouault, Leger, Roger de la Fresnaye, Romanesque sculpture, early Gothic windows. No doubt they all played their part in forming him. But at the present moment, while still in the thirties, Gromaire is his own master without a trace of that dilution which the strongest outside influence causes to take place in the personality of an artist. To say "Gromaire" is at once to receive the impression of a single character written in autograph.

Kisling, a year older than Gromaire, is much younger in the development of his are, which has undergone radical changes. His portrait of Lady Van Leer with the characteristic scarf wrapped heavily about the throat is a careful and delicate performance, happily free from the reminiscences of Modigliani that haunt much of the artist's work; but the warm nude from the Speiser collection, recalling early studio escapades with burnt sienna, seems to express more truly and simply the essential Kisling divested of his oriental taste for ornament and varied richness of color.

Moving back toward the men who not only have developed their individuality but have established it for a public which has learned what to expect from them and which, quite wrongly, considers them a fixed quantity in the art of the day, we find an impressive list of names. All are well known. It is only necessary to indicate what phase of their work is represented. Chagall and de Chirico are the youngest in the group. Chagall, the Russian, shows himself the childish player of the Moscow Theatre in his "Jewish Wedding," much more mature in the "Bareback Rider" of last year. De Chirico is seen in his most recent humor with two of the gladiator series—he is one who moves in series, to the delight of dealers and historians. His "Lion and Gladiators" from the Detroit Museum was painted about three years ago and holds all his qualities: the moderation of his Greek ancestry expressed in the quiet medium range of his color with its closely related values; his compact design pressed into the centre of his canvas, but flying banners of exultation—a waving tail, a feather in a hat, a curling shadow—that draw one toward the outer rim; his emphasis upon the individuality of whatever beast he introduces to us, in this case the lion foaming whitely at the mouth and planting a powerful paw upon the prone young hero of the arena. A tremendous mixture of classic myth and modern imagination, very interesting and arresting but not too difficult to leave.

Next Laurencin and de Segonzac, the former represented with extraordinary dignity, she whose innate dignity almost uniformly is disregarded because of the light ease with which she wears it! Her "Equestrian Figures," unsubstantial as to paint, films of pigment, veils of color, nevertheless communicates a sense of substantial flesh and blood in the riders as well as in the fine proud horses. De Segonzac, of just the age of Laurencin, affirms his unchallenged distinction with the laying on of pigment, great thick layers shoveled up with the brush and deposited on the canvas precisely where the artist wishes them to be, without haste or carelessness. Observe the "Canoeist," observe the "Landscape," how rightly the contours tell the story of the structure of man and tree. One may do it daintily, one may do it ruggedly, but to achieve distinction one must do it.

Landscape by Segonzac, in Exhibition at Museum of Modern Art.

UTRILLO and Leger both are true to their individual form; Braque gives several accounts of himself, each characteristic. Delaunay in "St. Severin" is scientific and deals with the dynamics of curved lines, laboratory work, but not unintelligible to an intelligent public. Leger is the more interesting as resembling Gromaire, because of his essential and emotional unlikeness to Gromaire. Picasso, just grazing the half-century mark, is given a wide range from his beautiful little study of a sinning child in "The Sweet Tooth" to his incomprehensible study, "A Seated Woman," of two or three years ago. Three volumes of pages the size of this newspaper page would not suffice to tell the story of Picasso's athletic leaps from one style to another, but the visitor to the Museum of Modern Art is given a gorgeous opportunity to leap with him from peak to peak, as each example represents his high reach in that kind.

After these artists, all on the hither side of that fifty-year summit from which we all expect to descend by definite degrees, come the older ones, a number of whom in defiance of our gloomy expectations seem the youngest of us all—until we test their wisdom and interrogate their experience. Matisse, for example, well over 60, whom age cannot wither, whose variety custom cannot stale. Survage, also, ten years younger, but on the slipping side, plays his game of new perspectives for old with an irresistible abandon. Derain is shown in several examples—all of his finest quality; Dufy is gay and mocking and insidiously ironic in his water-color "The Tight-Rope." Friesz, Vlaminck, Rouault are themselves. Dufresne is better than himself. Vuillard's "masterpiece"—the portrait of Theodore Duret in his study I—is here to compare with a portrait painted two decades earlier; Bonnard, not to be insulted by words assuming to describe the subtle, tender and humorous charm of his unexampled art; Forain at 78 showing us what he could do as a blithe young man observing a lady and a dog, also what he could do after he had bent a more embittered gaze upon criminals, lawyers and judges. That seems to exhaust the list. Full of the inexpressible urge which makes the humblest dauber of the studios hasten to his easel to find out if he, too, can do it, and, alas, to find out that he cannot.

ONE very happily may top off the excellent feast of French painting provided by the Museum of Modern Art with the beautiful little group of etchings by Segonzac now on exhibition at the Kraushaar Galleries. It is almost inconceivable to those who have not experienced the astonishing range described by the minds of superior artists, that these fine sensitive threads of etched line should be by Segonzac, the painter of meaty impasto, with masses of pigment the edges of which are as ragged as a beggar's sleeve. Yet so it is.

Another brisk anomaly is the fact that the finest and thinnest and most delicate of these linear interpretations frequently are spent upon the stalwart themes of the boxing stage. There is the victorious boxer making his way triumphantly, though somewhat limply, to his corner; there is the boxer with his head on the rope, his mouth open, and the "soigneurs" doing what they can for him; there are many pairs of combatants in pugilistic embrace; there are boxers "blanc et noir"; there are mighty shoulders "corps à corps"—all highly efficient, effectively muscular, trained to the limit, with no nonsense about them. The pugilist as he generally is portrayed, at least in this country, is a shade too beautiful; knocked out, he is a creature of pathos to be swathed in sentiment. Segonzac's fighting men are just fighting men, and about as charming as a fighting man looks in medias res. Yet the line never forgets to be charming, to wind itself delicately about the ferocious scene.

In the little landscapes—nearly all the plates are small—the subject supports the method, and in the various versions of "Fernande" the method is one dance of joy and adoration. Decidedly to miss seeing the etchings of Segonzac is to miss half the pleasure of his acquaintance.

AT BROOKLYN MUSEUM

The Twentieth Century Flemish Painters And Sculptors Arrive—Medard Verburgh

By EDWARD ALDEN JEWELL.

STRENGTHENED by additions to its already large initial showing some months ago at the Corcoran Gallery in Washington, the modern Belgian exhibition has in its journeying through this part of the country at length arrived at the Brooklyn Museum. Since it was reviewed on this page at the time of its first appearance in America, attention may now be concentrated upon the new work added and upon certain important aspects that lack of space before prevented our remarking.

But before coming to any particulars it is urgent to note that the show in its present setting displays its material to far better advantage than ever before. This is due to Director Fox's effective gallery arrangement of cubicles, which relieves the monotony of customary huge museum areas and makes possible a breaking up of the miscellany into convenient little homogeneous groups. The half-partition method, which Dr. Fox has already proved is a happy solution of problems that, when recognized at all, had formerly seemed insoluble, is coming more and more into use. It decidedly eases for a visitor the ordeal of getting about in a big mixed exhibition, besides affording the participating artists every opportunity to enunciate their bid for public approval.

DESPITE all that has been done to make the Belgian affair auspicious, however, it still strikes one observer as unwieldy and cluttered with work that makes a fairly poor, when not worse, impression. On the other hand, the exhibition is so comprehensive that it would appear to give us a very good general idea of contemporary production in the tiny land that has played so disproportionately large a rôle in history—this notwithstanding the fact, as announced by Christian Brinton, that "owing to various circumstances in connection with next year's centenary celebration it was impossible to obtain important and significant loans from the great State and private collections." Choice of paintings, graphic work and sculpture "was mainly restricted to the artists themselves and to certain amiable, enlightened amateurs; the result is nevertheless typical"—and such one is quite ready to believe it to be.

Our chief quarrel (though a perfectly good-natured quarrel) is with the products of the left wing, represented by men like Jan Brusselmans, Louis Decoeur, Fritz van den Berghe, Constant Permeke, Gustave de Smet and Ferdinand Schirren, who seem for the most part to be wasting their time: exponents of an era of transition long since worked to the last echo by French fauvism. However, let them go their way; it can do no irreparable harm, and possibly, instead of retarding the game, they may be clearing ground for some fresh development.

To Edgard Tytgat, though he too is a left-winger, naught that is derogatory in the foregoing applies. His satires are piquant, delicious—things like "Oriental Tale," "Inspiration," "A Dramatic Moment"—and he ought to be a real joy to collectors.

ADDITIONAL water-colors from Mr. Crowninshield's collection augment the Frans Masereel group, making this artist's one of the most compensating of the Brooklyn Museum cubicles. The color schemes are such as you are at liberty to accept or reject; that they are characteristic cannot be gainsaid; and after all, in an exhibition of this sort what is characteristic counts heavily. Also the somewhat feeble Ensor showing is bolstered by arrival upon the scene of "Marriage of the Masques" and "Death and Masques," both lent by Dr. and Mrs. Harry Bakwin. In fuzzy-impasto Jacob Smit's section, we find a new comer, "Shepherd," and several other artists (including William Paerels, whose "Old Houses, Marseilles" herewith makes its bow) enjoy a more than formerly generous representation.

Angèle Watson (née Hamendt), whose one-man show at the Babcock Galleries closed a week or so ago, has been invited to appear with these artists who inhabit the land of her birth; and having her present adds much to the pleasure as well as to the profit of the occasion. It is a pity that her "Jugoslav Woman," "Italo-American Girl," "Gardenias" and "Lemons and Persimmons" could not have been in from the start.

Persistent, as we see it, is the modern Belgian proneness to employ canvases much too big; canvases whose size is unwarranted when the intrinsic merit of a painting is weighed. Artist after artist (though not all of them) makes this mistake. As a rule, the larger the pictures get the worse they are. One can perhape forgive Eugene Laermans, whose "displacement" is more or less organic and to some extent compensated for by an ample, rhythmically contrived simplicity. But what can one say about Jean-Jacques Gaillard's fussy "Burning of Louvain" or, supremely, about Marie Howet's family at the cottage door, "In Ardenne"? What indeed?

Upon the whole, the more "traditional" painters come off best; they may not be very exciting, but they do stick to guns that will fire and (even though one murmur "Cui bono?") hit the mark. Much of the graphic work is excellent, and most excellent of all is the sculpture. Georges Minne, in his kneeling figures, argues an affinity with the German sculptor, Georg Kolbe, though he lacks the latter's lyricism and, in general, his sensitiveness to plastic line. Three or four of the Belgian sculptors show pieces that are arresting and beautiful. Naturally, it is Constantin Meunier, well known long ere this in America as in Europe, who maintains an easy lead. All of his work bears the imprint of genuine authority; and in the lovely panels, "Harvest" and "Return of the Miners," especially, this soundness of workmanship reaches articulation of compelling grace. The pieces by this sculptor are appropriately displayed upon the threshold of the exhibition, in what Dr. Brinton terms a Meunier Chapelle.

Some cases filled with examples of Belgian lace constitute a further attraction, missed by towns that got the exhibition ahead of Brooklyn.

WE are having a veritable little Belgian festival just now. Only one canvas by Médard Verburgh finds a place in the Brooklyn Museum assemblage, but he is holding a concurrent one-man show at the Newhouse Galleries, which should not be missed by any one interested in modern Belgian art—or, for that matter, in art more catholicly considered.

Robert de Bendère's empty monograph on the artist (issued, in miserable translation, by Editions d'Art) ill prepares one to appreciate M. Verburgh's true qualifications. To be sure, the forty-six examples, mostly oils, are not all of equal artistic virtue. M. Verburgh prefers to paint very rapidly, and sometimes the result is felicitous, sometimes less persuasive. Going over a quantity of reproductions in M. de Bendère's book this reviewer concluded that in still life the Belgian probably attains his goal most successfully. With important qualifications, this preliminary conclusion is substantiated. Some of the still lifes are first rate, particularly those whose subject is flowers. Certain landscapes, however—or rather marines—make an impression quite as satisfying. When the artist's impetuosity climbs to its best fruition we have work of finely integrated force, fresh in its viewpoint, wholly captivating as to color.

But the real sensation of this show is, or was prior to the opening, to be found in a small adjoining room: a nude of spontaneous yet closely-wrought power, splendidly "realized," as artists like to say, and—though breath-taking incredulity demands at once inspection at close range—done in water-color. Mme. Verburgh explains that her husband prepares his paper in some intricate way; but even so, this nude must be esteemed a most remarkable water-color, considering its size and considering the subject.

James Chapin.

ALL the modern talk about volume and three-dimensional painting (and what a deal of such talk we have heard from Cézanne on!) seems drawn to a kind of synthesis as you examine James Chapin's canvases, product of several years' intelligent application, now exhibited at Mr. Rehn's gallery. Here, indeed, is volume; here, if ever, the much discussed third dimension—a dimension sometimes, alas, more difficult convincingly to achieve than is the glamorous fourth.

Chapin's big "Emmet, George and Ella Marvin"—simple yet shrewd rurals, comfortably seated about the kitchen stove in the Marvin farmhouse—looks even more stalwart and important here than it did at the recent Carnegie International (where it might well, by the way, have taken a prize). This heroic picture offers proof, quite indefeasible, that art when really good has within itself a germ of growth. Mysteriously, if you like, a work of art grows, much as an animal or a human being does. How old, spiritually, the Marvin group by this time is, one might hesitate to estimate; but it is becoming venerable and wise with the wisdom that ripens only in this way.

Another canvas that figured in Mr. Chapin's Carnegie assortment is shown: "Pretzel Man," curious in its deft mosaic, at once terrible and amusing. Also there is a "Wood Pile," lent by Helen Hackett, which was seen a few seasons ago in the Philadelphia Salon. And again the artist confesses his musical penchant. Last year we had the touching portrait of "Ruby Green Singing"; this year's songbird is Louise Vermont (Joe March at the piano). Though commanding, though dominating the wall on which it hangs, this "Prelude" is less fine than the poignantly simple "Ruby Green"; a little theatrical; not so solid as the pictures dealing with humbler participants.

After all, Chapin belongs to the Marvins, just as the Marvins belong to Chapin. Yonder near the window with its outlook upon the throngs of Fifth Avenue sits Robert Frost the poet, calm and thoughtful in a softening haze of culture. He is convincing enough, yet one fails to experience the sharp, pungent authenticity of flavor that goes with the Marvin kitchen range and with such fields as those in which labors the "Farmer Cradling Grain."

James Chapin is an American artist of the first rank. He wasn't, it is true, admitted as one of the Nineteen Immortals at the Museum of Modern Art; but there are surely some, and perhaps there are not a few, who feel that the late performance in question would have benefited by such admittance.

A ROUND OF GALLERIES

Stuart Davis, Paul Bartlett, John da Costa, Society of Miniature Painters and Others

By RUTH GREEN HARRIS.

MANY an artist, determined to eliminate all but essentials, arrives at an ascetic result that may find a sympathetic audience, but no response from those who will have their art rich, luscious, thoroughgoing and rare. Without impoverishing the design, Stuart Davis can eliminate the non-essential, bringing you really an essence, the intrinsic nature of a thing, with no more body than it needs to make it live. The surface is sometimes thin as water, sometimes thick as sand, sometimes smooth as oil. The color, with the logic of a spectrum, gives the surface its vitality, and saving it from being superficial, grants it its dimension: a dimension that might find its entire existence in color, without the persuasive shapes that take you round a square in "La Place des Vosges," in through the "Blue Café," or past the corner of a "Carrefour." Then a march of accents, like a parade of perpetually moving soldiers, strengthens the purpose of the shapes.

All the detail is essential: the blue patch of a letter box, the grill of a balcony, the droop of a flag, the affiche on a wall, the smoke from a chimney, that seems to spiral commonsensically in the way smoke goes when some one tells you it is (or is not) going to rain. Blot out the spot and you blot out the punctuation that gives a phrase its meaning.

That never-ending subject of matter! Should it be first in the artist's mind, or last, or not at all? First and last, from its arcades to its chimneys these paintings by Stuart Davis are portraits of La Place des Vosges, and they lose nothing by being portraits of the most beautiful place in the world. Stuart Davis—The Downtown Gallery—Closes Feb. 10.

PAUL BARTLETT must do his thinking away from the canvas, so that when he gets his palette in hand he can put down directly all the complex thought. The brush is straightforward and the manner lucid without being simple. Color is bathed in liquid mist curling behind trees and flowers, rounding their form and granting them a fanciful beauty that does not hide nor destroy the beauty of actual fact. Those who share these landscapes with the artist find themselves wondering whether their heads dominate their hearts, or their hearts their heads. But along a country road flanked by high trees that mingle their shadows with its dust, the tiny figure of a woman seems to give a picture that calls itself "Country Road" the conclusions, whatever they may be, to which she herself has arrived. Paul Bartlett—The Kraushaar Galleries—Closes Jan. 30.

Looking at the classic portraits by John da Costa, one thinks first of the subject, and the subject is always charming: beautiful women, beautiful children, aristocratic gentry, or keen sportsmen. The painting is English, of eighteenth century flavor, purposely so when the sitters are dressed for the part, more artlessly eighteenth century when their clothes belong to the twentieth. Even if the subject borrows from the French, and white-capped musicians in the costume of the Italian Comedy play behind the back of a buxom pierrette, her red-gold color, no less than the manners of her painter, proclaim her nationality; setting back the time two centuries, manners are in the best English tradition. John da Costa—The Anderson Galleries—Closes Feb. 1.

APPARENTLY there have been so many misconceptions about miniatures that the Miniature Society opens its catalogue with something of an article of faith quoted from Thomas Sier Cummings.

"Miniature painting is governed by the same principles as any other branch of the art, and work in miniature should possess the same beauty of composition, correctness of drawing, breadth of light and shade, and firmness of touch, as works executed on a larger scale."

Their difference lies in the very fact that they are governed by the same principles, governed by their medium and by their size. They are too small to be seen feet away and must have the kind of surface beautiful to look into when you hold them in your hand; they are painted on ivory and there seems little reason to use its special texture unless the quality is preserved.

No artist contributing to the exhibition has met the exactions more sensitively than Elsie Dodge Pattee, to whom the Levantia White Boardman prize has been awarded. Other noteworthy contributions are those by Cornelia Hildebrandt, Grace Murray, Mabel Welch, Eulabee Dix, W. Sherman Potts and Lydia Longacre. American Society of Miniature Painters—Grand Central Galleries—Closes Feb. 1.

Other Exhibitions.

AT the Arden Galleries, until Feb. 12, Lily Cushing shows her drawings. This artist is very young and has had but little training. Her lack of training is felt in her inability to model a surface in such fashion as to indicate solid mass beneath a luminous skin. Melancholy subject betrays the artist's youth. In a few years she will be less scornful of complacency, less interested in looking at her own questions about this unhappy world. Her drawings have been bought by several important collectors.

Mrs. Erick Berry returns from her third trip into the interior of Africa, and, having shown her water-colors of the African scene at the Bernheim Jeunes in Paris, exhibits them now at the Milch Galleries until Feb. 1. Her third book on Africa, "As Human as We Are," is soon to be published. The Nigerian skin she paints, beautiful as the surface of an eggplant, is further enriched by green-striped, aristocratic turbans.

Nelson C. White's painting is also at the Milch until Feb. 1. With the exception of two or three still-lifes, Mr. White is showing small landscapes.

Of the four young painters at the G. R. D. Gallery, until Feb. 1—Judith Gutman, Lincoln Rothschild, Eloisa Scwab and Miron Sokole—the latter displays the most substantial talent. Almost as if it were his personal discovery, he proclaims the world to be round, in composition that depends for its depth not on the modeling of a surface but on the direction of a line.

What with the exhibition at the Grolier Club, an auction at the American Art Association and the present show at the Old Print Shop, which continues until Feb. 15, the city—or part of it—seems to have gone Currier & Ives minded. A healthy state of mind that is to be in, and many-sided, too; sentimental or sportive, historical or histrionic, homely or smart, for every man his taste.

THE new Opportunity Gallery exhibition will continue until Feb. 13. One would like to mention especially a solid still-life by Dorothy Eisner; the night-blooming cereus by Edith Hamlin, the flower designed against a landscape in such manner as to give one a sense of its rare beauty; by Irving Lehman another "Brooklyn Bridge" from still another point of view, and a water-color by Arthur Sudler.

Landscapes by Aldro T. Hibbard will be on exhibition at the Macbeth Galleries until Feb. 3. Mr. Hibbard belongs to the school of American painting that paints the panorama in as minute a detail as is consistent with this particular school's convention of perspective. Snow scenes give the artist opportunity to make pattern out of massed dark and light areas.

When a funny weekly is funny for a week, it has done its job excellently well; but if the joke persists after the issue is dead, then the artist who drew it may be a humorist as well as an opportunist. See old original drawings for The New Yorker on exhibition at the S. P. P. Penthouse during January.

Minga Pope Patchin frankly calls her sketches "oil drawings," and says "they have been most exciting to me." They look exciting, as if they had been done under the stimulus of meeting an interesting person for the first time. The instinct that sizes one up may bring more accurate conclusions than any of the after-thoughts that mull over character. As a good cut makes a coat stylish, so nice drawing gives these portraits style. Frank Purdy, Mrs. Adrian Islan 2d, Mrs. James H. Ripley and Minga Pope Patchin herself are among the sitters. The exhibition at the Ferargil Galleries will continue until Feb. 2.

The Fifteen Gallery, until Feb. 1, shows paintings and decorations by Andrew T. Schwartz. The decorations include a sketch for a breakfast room, for which Fellheimer & Co. are the architects; a sketch for a ceiling of a bank at Watertown, Mass., built by Dennison & Hirons; a jolly map of Brooklyn made for the Edison company.

Mary E. Dignam, at the Durand-Ruel Galleries until Jan. 30, exhibits paintings of Northern Ontario done in Spring and in Autumn. With a foliage that has turned unbelievably red, the Autumn pictures are most striking. Mary E. Dignam, who was born in Canada and has studied in New York, Paris, Holland and Italy, belongs to a number of the important cultural clubs in London and New York.

Dodge MacKnight's highly colored water-colors are being exhibited at the Babcock Galleries until Feb. 1. He has found his subjects at home and abroad. Intense desire for color turns the darks very purple and the lights orange-red. More homely scenes call for more subtle arrangement. In the cool "Dune Slope" of Cape Cod a stretch of white paper tones the values that meet it in delicate harmony; well-placed dark accents give character to the whole.

The Three Arts Club has just placed on exhibition water-colors and drawings by Helen Lee Peabody. These will remain until Feb. 2.

ANOTHER MYSTIC SEVEN

Sculptors Assembled at the Helen Hackett Galleries Get on Beautifully Together

THERE'S strength, they say, in numbers. Also there has always been a cabalistic awesomeness about the number seven. However, Helen Hackett needs neither of these lifesavers in bringing the ship to port. Rocks and reefs and derelicts, together with whatever further dangers may infest the deeps and shoals, are avoided by an unusually capable crew. The good ship docks, and the crew debarks, chanting in unison: "We are seven"—Alexander Archipenko, Allan Clark, Gleb Derujinsky, Boris Lovet-Lorski, Paul Manship, Nishan Toor, Heinz Warneke. A brave company they make, and a gala place indeed Mrs. Hackett's galleries become, with all these sculptors about to give it the je n' sais quois.

And how amicably they all get on together. You would think this one or that might conceivably introduce a note hard to reconcile, difficult to "combine." But no. Of course they are all modern, which helps; or rather they are all moderns of a certain consanguinity (for there are plenty of our contemporaries of other esthetic persuasions who, if introduced, would turn the whole affair into chaos). As a matter of fact, the air about Paul Manship's "Salomé" is just a trifle tense; for though Salomé was, we are told by historians and poets, a person of very advanced tastes, she has here got herself up in so curiously Victorian a manner, so in the "Lincoln As Emancipator" statuette group style, that one looks instinctively for the parlor dome of glass, and is not surprised to see Mr. Derujinsky's nice little marble nude nearby draw back with a gesture of alarm that tightens her muscles and lets repose fly out of the window.

HOWEVER, Manship's pieces are not all like the Salomé. There are the familiar handsome "Diana," the "Acteon" and the "Europa and Jupiter," exposing as fine an evidence of frozen speed as you will find in a considerable length and breadth of plastic decoration. Manship's figures are caught in mid-flight; release them and they will leap away how far; but, snared in passage, the chase becomes rhythmically static, without losing an ounce of zest.

Lovet-Lorski, whose show at the Grand Central Galleries a season or so ago will long be remembered, says he is making a determined effort to stay in two dimensions. Pausing, eye captive to the grace of his panel of "Stallions," you do not ask for more. Indeed, if our resourceful young man could find a way to operate in one dimension, should we complain? He has also done an interesting little Polynesian head in pewter, a medium that shows signs of increasing popularity among sculptors. Despiau made use of it in his last show. The tin in the mixture gives tone to the surface and the lead makes modeling simple. Lovet-Lorski's "Mask-Salomé" also deserves a star.

Nishan Toor is the disciple of uncomplicated planes, smooth stylization. Tranquillity and silence, besides giving titles to two of his little figures, lend themselves as general attributes. "Joy" too must be added unto these; specifically, it builds a flawless pyramid.

Heinz Warneke performs the pleasantest sort of small miracles in teak and ebony and antique bronze. The delightful "Colt Rising," successful wherever shown and never to be resisted, needs ampler size than that of the present cast. The same is possibly true, though in lesser degree, of the young horses that compose "The Wandering Three." But since artists are so liable to reverse the process, choosing sizes over-grand for themes over-small, the point ought not be stressed. And it is true of Warneke that whatever the measure of his mold, the distinction inherent in his forms makes itself immediately felt.

Archipenko's original torsos, with high-keyed surfaces that seem to emit more than they reflect, contribute their full share to the festive appearance of the rooms, as do also the three excellent pieces of Allan Clarke's. Mr. Clarke's newest work will be exhibited shortly in a one-man show that promises to contain not a few surprises. E. A. J.

THERE is an exhibition of sculpture by Rodin at the Balzac Galleries, until Feb. 8. Most of these examples are early replicas, many of them being the first or second casts made; a few are absolutely unique pieces, either "cire pardue" or, like the "Head of Balzac," in the original wax. The gallery has been considerate in showing some of the less often reproduced and less well-known examples of Rodin's work.

Walter Tittle, at the Kennedy Galleries, shows etchings, drypoints and lithographs during the present month. The portraits are his important contributions—portraits of artists and writers, for the most part. "The Arms Conference Memorial Portfolio," done from life, pictures twenty-five leading statesmen of the Washington conference. Each print in the limited edition, autographed personally by the statesmen who posed for it, is of great historic interest.

Geln C. Henshaw's paintings at the Ainslie Galleries will be on exhibition until Jan. 31. The artist bathes his landscapes in a gray-purple mist, the color of his imagination, so personal to him that the spectator has difficulty in seeing through it to the reality of any universal experience.

Paintings by Th. Namleson are on view, until the end of the month, at Lew Ney's Type and Book Shop, 16 East Fifteenth Street. The exhibition contains portraits, marines and landscapes. R. G. H.

Word has just been received that Emile René Ménard, the French artist, who has been a frequent exhibitor in the Carnegie International, is dead. He died in Paris Jan. 18. Two of his paintings, "Judgment of Paris" and "The Rape of Europa" are in the Carnegie Institute's permanent collection, and in 1922 his "Women Bathing in the Greve" was awarded the second prize at Pittsburgh.

OUT OF TOWN

Chicago.

Among the modern French paintings recently acquired through the Winterbotham Fund for the Art Institute are pictures by Jean Lurcat and a long panel-like "Summer Garden" by André Dunoyer de Segonzac.

The International Exhibition of Glass and Rugs, which recently closed at the Metropolitan Museum, is now in its third successful week at the Boston Museum.

OUR OWN ART AS SEEN THROUGH FRENCH EYES

The author of the following article, a young French painter, whose work has already found its way into numerous American collections, is also a critic, whose comment on events in the Parisian world of art appears regularly in these pages. M. Mauny is now in America for a short time, the special occasion prompting this visit being his one-man show at the De Hauke Galleries, reviewed in a previous issue.

By JACQUES MAUNY.

THE writer visited New York in the Spring of 1925 and returned to Paris for the opening of the great International Exhibition of Decorative Arts. The quality of this demonstration has been discussed and it is possible that it was not, on the whole, very high; but the consequences of the event were enormous. Since then, in Paris, the abominable copie d'ancien nightmare of post-war generations has been almost completely abandoned, every new department store, shop, hotel, ship, theatre and restaurant being now more or less conceived in the new spirit. Even in the Faubourg Saint Antoine, where the bad imitations of Gothic, Renaissance, Louis XIV, XV and XVI and Empire furniture used to be manufactured (and not only for the French but also for many foreign clienteles), twentieth century propositions are now displayed. All this, it is true, in general remains far from a severe and refined perfection, but as the French say, "you cannot make an omelet without breaking eggs"; and 1925, all the same, marked a great date in the history of architecture and applied arts—that is to say, in Europe.

Before landing in New York a few weeks ago the writer felt sure that he would observe a similar evolution in the greatest American city. But he was disappointed. All over Manhattan the powerful masses and fine straight lines of the skyscrapers are still soiled by childish gingerbread. In nearly every block little atrocities still hurt the eyes. The News Building alone seems free from incongruous, anachronistic ornamentation. A few great American citizens may consider it their civic duty to endow their country with foundations calculated to help in the creation of the most imperishable ornament a really high civilization must possess. The masses, however, do not seem to have too much need for art—in their old forms, at any rate. Perhaps the rhythm of their life is too brutal. Perhaps the American woman, a perfect living masterpiece, dispenses all the beauty needed by the country.

CERTAIN German and French thinkers who have been studying aspects of American life consider that systems that improve material conditions of democratic masses only may be discussed. They fear intensified "machinisme" and other developments, which, they argue, will be detrimental to disinterested intellect and profound culture. Standardization and mass production are conquering Europe, but the energetic influence of the U. S. A. remains confined to the more prosaic side of life; and if contemporary American literature is the object of numerous and serious studies, Europeans are generally skeptical of the existence of authentic arts in America.

In New York (as in Paris) the number of exhibitions of paintings increases in an alarming manner, while the average quality of exhibits seems to be declining. The underproducts of the Ecole de Paris factories are everywhere, and it is quite natural that American artists, already handicapped by material conditions, should strongly resent so indiscreet a dumping. But instead of adopting slavishly the weaknesses of imported fantasies, they ought to react very strongly to them. Foreign influences are essential to intensify the national spirit, and it is extremely regrettable that art, which is the best means of bringing international understanding, should degenerate into a cause for irritation.

In Paris, too, foreign artists enjoy the greatest vogue, and Paris is just hungry for authentic 100 per cent contributions to the esthetic of the twentieth century.

The Jeu de Paume of the Tuileries in Paris, an annex of the national museums where contemporary foreign schools are shown, is now being remodeled. Let us hope that it will reopen with a beautiful panorama of the American School.

A NEW museum, sponsored by some of the most important art patrons in this country and presenting a small selection of American paintings, is the very thing a foreign visitor wishes to find. But the exhibition of paintings by nineteen Americans at the new Museum of Modern Art does not appear to be generally considered as an ideal one. Amateurs rarely agree on names, even when universally recognized leaders who have been dead for a good many years are concerned; when it comes to the present generation, it is preferable to offer the selection of one single person, assuming full responsibility, rather than a sort of "representation proportionelle" that dissatisfies everybody.

The selection hung at the Gallery of Living Art, New York University, seems more attractive to a European enthusiast, probably because the director, Albert Eugene Gallatin, who has been acting as a sort of prudent but sensitive American observer in Paris, has carefully avoided all that might not agree with French taste. Omitted in the Heckscher Building demonstration, some artists have been given full recognition in Washington Square.

The American critics who wrote that Marin and Demuth are no more than water-color "specialists" must be sacrilegious vandals. In the person of these artists the United States certainly possess two excellent pure painters. Marin's one-man show in Mr. Stieglitz's prophylactic setting is moving. There is something generous and at the same time austere about it which is truly American.

To a foreigner, Charles Sheeler also appears as a very high expression of puritanic distinction; Man Ray as an adventurer of great taste. But if these two men have painted extremely fine things, they perhaps have reached a still higher perfection in their photographic works. There is no reason why the artists of a new, inventive country should, necessarily, express themselves in oil, a medium for which they very rarely seem to have a real feeling, when they can realize achievements of such amazing purity with the camera. Beautiful photographs by Stieglitz, Sheeler and Man Ray are perhaps the masterpieces of our period, just as the paintings in oil of the Van Eycks and by Fouquet were centuries ago.

JEAN GIRAUDOUX, author of "Amica America" and one of the leading French writers, asserts that there are no Americans, but only Europeans transplanted on a new rich soil. Nevertheless, as years go, the new race resulting from the fusion of heterogeneous elements will assume stronger national characteristics and may soon liberate itself from the European artistic dictatorship. Let us hope that Americans will soon become more conscious of their personality; may cease to be incurable addicts of the copie d'ancien and spring to life.

New York is the most picturesque city in the world, the sort of place Méryon would have liked, and one that would be a source of inspiration to Picasso. Not only does it offer the richest and most varied material to real artists; it is also a villa d'art. The collections of early American art at the Brooklyn Natural History and American Indian museums are absolutely formidable.

Architects and artists are sure eventually to realize the value of this aboriginal art, native flower of the American Continent, and the only one which was created for its crystal-like sky—just as Gothic art was the flower created for the damp and delicate scenery of Ile de France.

MANY NAMES ARE ADDED TO SOCIETY'S ENGAGEMENT LIST

BETROTHALS ANNOUNCED

Miss Frelinghuysen To Be Married to R. H. Carleton Jr.

THE numerous engagements that have been announced recently forecast many Spring weddings. That of Miss Frederica L. Frelinghuysen and Richard High Carleton Jr. is one of the notable engagements that have been announced since New Year's. It is of interest to a large circle of relatives and friends not only in New York but in New Jersey, with which State the Frelinghuysen family long has been identified and in which her parents have a Summer home.

Miss Frelinghuysen is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Peter H. B. Frelinghuysen of 856 Fifth Avenue and Twin Oaks, Morristown, N. J., and is related to many old New York and New Jersey families, including the Ballantines of Newark.

She is a great-granddaughter of the late Frederick T. Frelinghuysen of New Jersey, who was Secretary of State in President Arthur's Administration. Mr. and Mrs. George G. Frelinghuysen are her grandparents and Mrs. Charles L. McCawley of Washington, D. C., wife of Brig. Gen. McCawley, United States Marine Corps, and Miss Lucy Frelinghuysen of this city are her grandaunts.

ON the maternal side Miss Frelinghuysen belongs to the Havemeyer and Elder families of this city. She is a descendant of Frederick C. Havemeyer, who with his brother, William F. Havemeyer, in the early part of the nineteenth century came to this country from Bercherburg, Schaumburg-Lippe, Germany, and were pioneers in the American sugar refining industry.

They started in a small way in a house on Vandam Street, in Greenwich Village, and that business, which was handed down from father to sons, eventually became the American Sugar Refineries Company, with the late Henry O. Havemeyer, grandfather of Miss Frelinghuysen, as first vice president. He succeeded to the presidency on the death of his brother, Theodore A. Havemeyer.

Miss Frelinghuysen's grandmother, the late Mrs. Henry O. Havemeyer, was Miss Louisine Waldron Elder, daughter of the late George W. Elder, also a sugar refiner, and a sister of Mrs. Samuel T. Peters. The late Mrs. Havemeyer was a collector of art and at her death a year ago left her notable collection, which included several Rembrandts, to the Metropolitan Museum of Art. The Havemeyer house at the northeast corner of Fifth Avenue and Sixty-sixth Street was a small art museum.

Horace Havemeyer and Mrs. James Watson Webb are uncle and aunt of Miss Frelinghuysen, who was a débutante of last Winter. She was graduated from Miss Porter's School in Farmington, Conn.

Mr. Carleton is the son of Mr. and Mrs. R. High Carleton of this city and Dublin, N. H. He attended St. Paul's School and is a member of the class of '31 at Yale University. Mrs. Andrew Varick Stout Jr., the former Miss Juliet Carleton, is his sister.

ANOTHER notable engagement is that of Miss Marion Moore and John W. Cross Jr. Their marriage, which probably will be an event of the early Spring, will unite families that have long been prominently identified with this city. Miss Moore is the younger daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Small Moore and a granddaughter of Mrs. William H. Moore and the late Judge Moore, who for many years was an exhibitor and one of the officials of the National Horse Show. Judge Moore had a private course at his Summer home, Rockmarge, Prides Crossing, Mass., where he exercised his thoroughbreds.

On the maternal side Miss Moore is a granddaughter of Mrs. John R. McGinley of Pittsburgh and the late Mr. McGinley, who was a director in many corporations. She is the sister of Mrs. Oliver Malcolm Wallop of Big Horn, Wyo., whose husband is the second son of the Earl and Countess of Portsmouth.

Mr. Cross is the elder son of John W. Cross, the architect, and the late Mrs. Cross, who was Miss Lily Lee Page, daughter of Mrs. Howard Page and the late Mr. Page. Mrs. Courtlandt Nicoll is his aunt.

Mr. Cross is a grandson of the late Richard James Cross, who for many years lived in Washington Square, and his first wife, who was Miss Tillie Redmond. After the death of the latter Mr. Cross married her sister, Miss Annie Redmond, who died about a year ago. They were daughters of the late Mr. and Mrs. William Redmond. Mrs. Allan Marquand, widow of Professor Marquand of Princeton, is an aunt of Miss Moore's fiancé. He also is related to George Eliot, the English authoress, through his paternal grandfather, whose brother, John Walter Cross, was her husband.

MISS MARGARET HOWLAND MEYER, whose engagement to Kenneth Appleton Ives was announced recently, comes of a long line of distinguished ancestors, including John Howland of the Mayflower. Gardiner Green Howland and Samuel Willets, who were long identified with Long Island, were her great-great-grandfathers. She is a granddaughter of Mrs. Cord Meyer and the late Mr. Meyer, who was widely known as a developer of large tracts of Long Island realty, Elmhurst and Forest Hills being two of the towns developed by him.

Cord Meyer, member of the old-time firm of sugar refiners of Dick & Meyer, was her great-grandfather. She is also a granddaughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner Howland Leavitt. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Garrison Meyer of Shore Acres, Bayside, L. I.

Mr. Ives is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Ives of Bedford Village, N. Y. He is a grandson of the late Mr. and Mrs. William G. Appleton and of the late Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Olmstead Ives. He is an alumnus of Yale.

LEAGUE WORKS FOR BABY SHELTER

Juniors Selling Tickets for Performances of "Rebound" To Raise Funds for Unit's Main Charity

MEMBERS of the Junior League are engaged in securing subscriptions to two forthcoming performances of a new play which will be given to aid the support of the league's main charity, the Baby Shelter. The show, which will open shortly, is "Rebound," featuring Hope Williams, a member of the league, and it will come to the Plymouth Theatre.

The performances on the nights of Feb. 4 and 5 have been taken over as the annual benefit organized by the league. Each year these theatrical benefits arouse the interest of many in society who have friends or relatives in the Junior League.

The Baby Shelter, now situated in the league's new clubhouse in Seventy-first Street, is part of the league's charitable work and is the only shelter of its kind in the metropolis. In previous years the shelter had been situated outside the league's headquarters, but the importance of its work so impressed the managers that they decided to move it into their own clubhouse.

Shelter and nursing are provided without regard to race, creed or color to infants whose parents find themselves unable to care for them. Sometimes the infants remain at the shelter for as long as two years. Hospital care is also provided where necessary.

Visitors to the shelter have been impressed by the equipment and method of work, which is conducted under the direction of Miss Madge R. Nevins, a graduate nurse, and Dr. George Craig Ludlow.

In the event that an infant's parents die he is cared for by a worthy family living in the country at the league's expense and under its supervision until he can be adopted. Occasions have been known when young mothers have paid small sums from their earnings to help defray the expenses involved. The shelter never asks this, but quotes it as an example of appreciation of its work.

The Baby Shelter is the only philanthropic work of the Junior League for which it appeals to the public for support. Already there has been an encouraging sale of boxes and seats for the coming benefit. It is the custom of many of the subscribers to give dinners beforehand and take all their guests to the theatre.

Some of those who have taken tickets for the first performance are Mrs. Van Rensselaer Halsey, Mrs. J. T. Johnston Mali, Mrs. George Eustis Paine, Mrs. George B. St. George, Mrs. John De Witt Peltz, Mrs. Arthur Osgood Choate, Mrs. William Thomas Kissell, Mrs. James Snowden, Mrs. Edmund Twining, Mrs. Maitland Dwight, Mrs. Harry Harkness Flagler, Mrs. Schuyler Schieffelin, Mrs. Arthur Train, Mrs. Vanderbilt Webb, Miss Alouise Boker, Mrs. Ernest Fahnestock, Mrs. Carleton Betts, Mrs. Reginald T. Townsend, Miss Marian Willard, Mrs. Kenneth O'Brien, Mrs. J. Cuthbert Palmer, Mrs. Alan Bakewell and Mrs. Morgan Wing.

PALM BEACH LAYS PLANS

Clubs and Societies Arranging a Crowded Calendar—Boxing Bouts to Start

PALM BEACH, Fla.

THE advancing season has brought an additional number of Winter colonists to their Palm Beach homes during the past week. The few who are remaining North are expected to be on hand by the end of this week. After Feb. 1 all of the institutions of the resort will be in full swing and life will assume the swift tempo for which Palm Beach is famous.

An event of tomorrow will be the first of the semi-weekly boxing bouts at the Oasis Club. The program for the evening includes dinner, for which many reservations have been received, a series of bouts in the ring at the north end of the patio and dancing. In previous seasons the bouts have been held at the club in the afternoon, followed by a tea dance. This year it has been decided to hold them on alternate Monday evenings. Weekly bouts sponsored by the American Legion posts of West Palm Beach and of Lake Worth draw large throngs on Tuesday and Friday evenings from the Palm Beach Winter colony.

The current events lecture series will be resumed this year, with Mrs. John R. Bryden as chairman of the committee, which includes also Mrs. Henry Seligman, Mrs. John F. Harris, Mrs. Alfred G. Kay and Mrs. Earle Perry Charlton. The lectures will be held on Wednesday afternoons at the homes of members. Mr. Richard will come to Palm Beach from a lecture tour, including a debate in New York, under the auspices of the League for Political Education.

The second lecture of the series will be a debate on the London naval conference by Nicholas Roosevelt and Judge Alexis Deboer of Hungary. It will be at El Mirasol, the home of Mr. and Mrs. Edward T. Stotesbury, on Feb. 12. Mr. Roosevelt, a member of the editorial staff of THE NEW YORK TIMES, was attached to the American Embassy in Paris, 1914-16; served on the American peace mission in 1918-19 and headed the American mission to Hungary in 1919. Judge Deboer, who is to deliver a series of lectures in the United States, has served as justice of the Supreme Court of Administration in Hungary.

The concerts of the Society of Arts of Palm Beach will also begin during the first week of February. The first two concerts, on Feb. 3 and Feb. 10, will be given by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Henri Verbrugghen, at the Paramount Theatre. At the opening concert Nina Morgana, Metropolitan Opera soprano, will be the soloist.

The succeeding concerts, for members only, will be given at the Everglades Club on Monday evenings.

PROBLEMS OF THE MOUNTAIN SCHOOLS

Study by Southern Women Shows Conditions That Surround Students

IN a series of studies of conditions confronting schools in the backward districts of the South the Southern Women's Educational Alliance has delved into the whole scheme of rural life in that part of the United States and portrayed it in a unique close-up picture. Taking a small mountain school as a starting point, it has followed the trail of the pupils' lives in both directions: to the city, where country youth becomes raw material for the labor market and the social structure; and to the original homes, to see what handicaps and pitfalls are to be found there.

The work has taken five years, and from it have come six books, now ready for publication, in which the picture is presented. While the alliance has been responsible for the undertaking, and its president, Dr. O. Latham Hatcher, formerly Associate Professor of English at Bryn Mawr College, has been the editor, the finished product represents a work of national scope, for a number of both governmental and university officials have cooperated in carrying it through.

The purpose was to lay the groundwork for improving the educational methods employed and to get a clear conception of the whole situation so that the school could be made to deal more effectively with its pupils. That effort is more than locally important, since about half of all the farm children in the United States are in eleven Southern States, and about half of all who migrate to the cities come from this section. President Hoover has recently focused attention on the needs of these children by himself taking an interest in their education.

A Close-up of Country Life.

The result of the study too, has gone beyond the original purpose. No such intimate picture of life in the country has ever been attempted before, so far as is known; certainly none has been linked directly with the problem of raising the standard of culture through education. As such it has taken on a national importance because of its usefulness to all persons concerned with adjusting country children to the city or with improving rural life.

The studies were made primarily about girls, because the Southern Woman's Educational Alliance is primarily interested in helping them, but in most parts it had to take the boys into consideration, too, and the background, naturally, applied to both.

In its study of rural girls in the city, made in Durham, N. C., and Richmond, Va., in cooperation with the University of North Carolina, it found that 86 per cent of those they interviewed—mill workers, store clerks and office help, waitresses and nurses—felt that they had improved their lot by the change. The investigators were not always so sure, but even they estimated that in 74 per cent of the cases it meant an improvement.

The city jobs, though apparently full of drudgery, looked better than the round of chores the girls had had to do in the country. The jobs themselves were more interesting, and—the important point in most minds—although the work in both cases might be hard, in the city at least they had money of their own, and companionship in their work.

The problem of staying in the country is presented in quotations from the girls themselves. The homes, to begin with, should have modern conveniences, which on the one hand would lighten drudgery and make responsibilities attractive, and on the other would make the homes places to which the children would be proud to bring their friends.

As Youth Sees the Home.

Pay, moreover, should be given for work done, especially when it was work ordinarily done by hired help. Boys especially should have the opportunity for ownership, such as a piece of property, to which they could look forward to owning and developing. And the schools, as was poitned out by the girls themselves, should make an effort both to awaken the interest of the pupils and to encourage them to play. "The boy or girl who plays well," it was argued, "studies well."

For the boys and girls who migrate to the cities the principal need is for vocational guidance. At present, the alliance says, they have little comprehension of the basic occupations by which civilized life and the social order are maintained. They need to have "the whole fabric of understanding of the world's work" and their place in it—whether in a rural or urban occupation—built up from the beginning, so that they will have the knowledge as a basis for judgment when time for decision comes, especially as such decisions are often made suddenly and with too little discretion.

The environment in these Southern mountain districts, as found particularly in the back country districts of Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina and Georgia, means that the children there suffer "almost the extreme of rural underprivilege." The land itself offers scant possibilities. The director of the Virginia Agricultural Station, speaking of the Appalachian region, says that "so far as the poorer mountain lands are concerned, I think it will be best for these mountain farmers to leave the poor farming land and find employment elsewhere."

A test of some of the regions by even moderate standards for living conditions is little more than a travesty. One district in particular was examined as a sample. The rating scheme was one that had been tried successfully elsewhere, in which certain scores were awarded for the presence of various representative items, such as window curtains, wall coverings or paint, indoor pumps or piped water, sinks with proper outlets, iceless refrigerators or window boxes for keeping food, sewing machines, sheds, farm improvements representing actual money spent, &c. The possible score was 1000; the actual rating of the district was 43.

"None of the houses of the community has a bathtub or indoor toilet, all are heated either by open fireplaces or by stoves, and the only lighting is by lamp or candle light," the report says. "Many of the houses have no steps at all, only three are painted." Many of the houses in mountain areas further away, it adds, "are frame and most of them are very poorly built, always unscreened, and often cracked, so that at all seasons the air blows through freely. The habit of leaving doors open persists even in the Winter with the family huddled around the open fire." Colds are "accepted as a law of nature and allowed to run their course."

Even this environment is made worse, so far as the raising of the children is concerned, by the drifting habits of the parents.

The Konnarock Training School, in Smyth County, Va., chosen as the entering wedge in attacking the situation, is a mission school founded by the Woman's Missionary Societies of the United Lutheran Church. To the alliance it offered a good teaching staff free from preconceived notions about educational methods, and the experiments being made there are designed to produce a model by which other mountain schools may be guided—with all due freedom.

The Plan as Evolved.

As a result of its experience, the alliance has abandoned any idea of forming a general plan for the development of all the pupils. It has found that almost every child presents a highly individual problem and that while a large proportion of the students can be trained with the probability that they will return to their mountain environment, many may not, and there are some who would present an appalling waste of talent if not helped on to larger opportunities. The whole effort is thus to build up a system of individual guidance so that each child can be separately considered.

The educational program has been shaped to fit this plan. The whole scheme of grades ordinarily followed in grammar schools has been made far more flexible. Each child has the opportunity of taking studies suited to its natural interests, and may have classes in various grades and under several teachers, more on the order of a college course. The effect of this, it has been found, is to raise the "intelligence quotients" of the students, although at some expense to the "educational quotients." The students develop more self-reliance and capacity, that is, but divide their interests more between their studies and more active undertakings.

The alliance is going on the theory that this quickening of intelligence is the more desirable. For the children who are going back to live in their mountain environment, especially, it is felt, such a training not only offers the best equipment for them but also promises that they will be active personalities in raising the standard of life around them.

RADIO GIRDLES THE EARTH WITH HISTORIC BROADCAST

ALL THE WORLD EAVESDROPS ON THE LONDON CONCLAVE

America Hears King George Speak With Determination to Prevent Repetition of War's Grim Tragedy—New Era In World-Wide Broadcasting Is Foreseen

By ORRIN E. DUNLAP JR.

RADIO established new and historic records during the past week in the broadcasts from the five-power naval parley at London. For the first time the voice of a European sovereign echoed 'round the earth and entered the homes of Americans from coast to coast and border to border. It was on Jan. 21, 1930, that King George V went on the air at 6:08 A. M., Eastern Standard Time, speaking into a gold microphone. The broadcasters estimate that 100,000,000 listened in.

What an audience for the ruler of the empire upon which the sun never sets! It was a trifle early in the morning for most Americans to listen in, although it was 11 A. M. in London. But the American audience crawled out of bed and turned on the radio to hear a medley of international voices. They wanted to hear the King of England. They wondered if he had an English accent.

His Majesty was described as wearing "simple morning dress like that of the commoners." In America his early morning audience in many cases listened in while dressed in their pajamas or while they dressed, while they shaved, and while they ate breakfast. They listened to words that crossed the sea at the speed of sunlight to condemn war, with a determination "to leave nothing undone to prevent a repetition of that grim and immense tragedy—the great war."

Hoover Joins the Audience.

President Hoover arose at 5 A. M. and listened to the preliminary program while he dressed. In a heavy sweater, old trousers and rubber-sole canvas sneakers he sat around a loud-speaker with his "medicine ball cabinet" in a basement room of the White House. The remarkable clarity of reception won his praise.

France reported that the speeches by radio calmed the French press because of the sincerity and good-will which had a wholesome effect upon public opinion. German homes, offices and cafés enjoyed fine reception of "a veritable babel of voices that swamped several million radio fans for two hours" with a technical perfection that left little to be desired. Visitors abandoned Winter sports in the Alps to get in tune with the rest of the world and reported distinct reception at the Jungfraujoch, 12,000 feet above sea level. Copenhagen, Basle, Budapest, Vienna, Stockholm and Paris, as well as hundreds of other cities were within range of the broadcast sent out from more than twenty-five stations on the Continent. Australians recognized the King's voice but static made many of the words unintelligible. Manila picked up the 25-meter waves from London and rebroadcast the program on 32 meters for Australia. Japan was disappointed because the King's voice was "loud, brassy and roaring," and a pianist believed to have been performing at a Russian station sent his crescendo chords crashing unceremoniously into the Japanese ether to disturb the words of Mr. Wakatsuki's speech. All parts of India were in tune with the speakers in the House of Lords as the short waves sprayed the words of good-will across the face of the earth carrying a message of peace to all nations.

Pledges of Good-Will.

The loud-speakers and headphones throughout the world were within tuning range of the wondrous short waves that find little or no difficulty in encircling the globe. The diaphragms of the reproducers vibrated with many foreign tongues all pledging a sincere desire "to eliminate the evil results of wasteful naval armaments." They pledged peace and good-will among men.

The broadcast was extraordinarily clear in the United States and Canada. The voices of King George and the delegates to the conference who spoke were free of static, except for an occasional splash that did practically no damage to the words, and fading failed to attack the waves from over the sea as it usually does.

This was radio's greatest broadcast. It showed that radio engineers have made remarkable strides in the development of apparatus and circuits that bring the inhabitants of the earth closer together. The clarity of the voices here made it difficult to realize that the statesmen were actuating microphones in London and not in New York.

It was considered a great scientific achievement in 1925 to pick up the sound of Big Ben on the House of Parliament and rebroadcast it in Washington, New York and Schenectady when the gong struck midnight. The engineers point out that it is a far greater achievement to broadcast words spoken in a variety of foreign tongues and have those words encircle the globe without losing their identity. The broadcasters have revealed what they can do and they have given a good indication that before long Americans will not be limited to their own land for entertainment and fine music. The marks on the dials are likely to represent London, Paris, Berlin, Rome, Brussels, Vienna, Madrid, Tokio and hundreds of other cities where musical programs and events of international interest can be microphoned for a world-wide audience. Radio seems destined to be an international reservoir from which millions of listeners can draw their entertainment and much education. Sometimes listeners complain that radio is too much the same. The international programs are expected to change this situation.

In the Dawn's Early Light.

Much credit for the success of the London conference broadcast in the United States is given to the engineers of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company who have built and now operate the transatlantic radiophone circuit known as "the talk-bridge that spans the sea." The Columbia System with WABC as its key station was linked up with the transatlantic radiophone and later in the broadcast the National Broadcasting Company with WEAF-WJZ as its key transmitters was forced to relinquish its own short wave circuit and intermittently use the American Telephone and Telegraph transoceanic channel. When dawn crept across the sea and neared the American shore WEAF-WJZ were switched into the American Telephone and Telegraph system which was not so adversely affected by the dawn's early light.

Dawn and sunset are two critical periods for radio. It sometimes happens that entirely different wave lengths must be used as soon as the first signs of sunrise and sunset appear.

It is pointed out that so marked is the effect of dawn that coastal operators listening in all night to a babel of dots and dashes from ship and shore stations suddenly notice a pall of silence. To them it means that the East is streaked with the first faint light of the day, and the ships with which they communicated throughout the night will not be heard again until night brings darkness again over the sea.

Never before have such extensive facilities been mustered to insure the success of a broadcast, and to overcome the effect of daybreak. Plans were made to guard against failure of the short waves sent out from Rugby and Chelmsford to reach America. If static were bad or fading occurred in an instant a switch could have been made to send the ceremony from London by wire to Huizen, Holland, or to Koenigwusterhausen, Germany, for short wave transmission.

Delegates to Speak.

William Hard's daily summaries of the parley, introducing outstanding figures represented at the conclave, will be carried to a nation-wide network linked with WEAF and WJZ. Broadcasting will begin at 1 P. M. daily, lasting for fifteen minutes. Reirjeiro Wakatsuki, head of the Japanese delegation, has been invited to speak through the N. B. C. facilities on Monday, and Secretary of State Stimson, chief of the American group, is expected to actuate the microphone on Tuesday. Others who will be introduced to listeners on two continents have not been announced as yet. Mr. Hard's daily summaries will continue until the conference reaches some conclusion on the naval problem.

Frederic William Wile will give a résumé of the proceedings of the conference to date together with a forecast of the future deliberations and sidelights on the personalities attending the parley in a hook-up at 8:15 o'clock on Thursday nights over WABC's network. Mr. Wile will also speak from London.

George III little realized that some day the precise tones of George V and the oratory of Premier Ramsay MacDonald would be criss-crossed through space to reach millions of auditors in a populous nation on the other side of the Atlantic, and in other lands across the seven seas to warn that "if we are not careful, we shall be once more involved in a feverish competition such as preceded the outbreak of the recent war. It may be said with absolute accuracy that the whole world is staring at us today."

The world stares through loud-speakers in 1930, but some day some peaceful conclave will be actually stared at by television, by radio that links the ends of the earth with sound and sight, by music and words of peace and good-will.

In the words of Mr. MacDonald, "Truly, we are living in times of great miracles."

HOOVER TO BROADCAST

President Hoover's address at the twentieth annual conference dinner of the Boy Scouts of America will be broadcast through the WJZ system on Monday night, March 10, from 9 to 9:30 o'clock, Eastern Standard Time.

The address will be delivered at the dinner in the New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C. Besides President Hoover, who is honorary president of the Boy Scouts, the other speaker will be Walter W. Head, active president of the organization.

WLBZ JOINS NETWORK.

WLBZ, a 500-watt broadcasting station in Bangor, Me., owned and operated by the Maine Broadcasting Company and operating on a frequency of 620 kilocycles, has become the seventy-second link on the nation-wide network of the Columbia Broadcasting System. This station is the only broadcasting unit in the immediate vicinity of Bangor. It operates on full time. WLBZ will carry Columbia System programs from 8 in the morning until midnight, with little time off this schedule given over to local programs.

KDKA WIRE SPRAYS MUSIC INTO SPACE

Action of Latest Antenna Compared to a Lawn Sprinkler—Station Can Be Made to Send Local or Long-Distance Signal

PLANS for the improvement of broadcasting throughout the country have been presented before the Federal Radio Commission by Dr. Frank Conrad, assistant chief engineer of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company. One plan comprises a system or method of so combining two or more broadcasting stations on one wave length that no interference results. Another plan, soon to be tried out at the new KDKA transmitting plant at Saxonburg, Pa., is a method of constructing the transmitting aerial so that either powerful local or distant signals result.

This system of antenna arrangement, according to Walter C. Evans, the Westinghouse superintendent of radio operations, may be arranged either to produce a strong local signal around the broadcasting antenna and a weak signal outside this area, or a weak local signal and a strong distant one.

"The new antenna system will make it possible for a cleared channel station to broadcast with high power without blanketing the surrounding area," said Mr. Evans. "The system can also be used so that a local station can send out a strong signal in its own territory without interfering with distant stations.

"Synchronization of two or more stations on one wave has the advantage of making it possible to increase the service area of a program furnished identically to two or more stations without increasing the number of channels used. It also reduces fading. A third advantage claimed is that a small booster station can be erected to give service in a 'dead spot' area where the parent station is not well received.

Aerial Is at Saxonburg.

"The new aerial system will first be applied at the new KDKA transmitter which is being built near Saxonburg, Pa. Experiments with the antenna have been carried on for several months with a short wave station at the site. When it is desired to have a station send out a strong local signal without distance transmission the antenna is built so that it radiates a powerful wave along the ground but does not send one into the air where it would be deflected to distant areas by the Heaviside layer. If the station is on a cleared channel it can be made to send out a strong sky wave with a small amount of ground wave. This will allow the powerful stations of the country to cover wide areas without interfering with receivers in their immediate vicinity.

"At Saxonburg this effect will be achieved with eight individual antennae set on 110-foot poles ranged in a circle 800 feet in diameter. In order to send out a strong sky wave the antennae are so arranged that the horizontal radiations of each one will be blocked off by the signals of the other antennae. Thus the only way in which the major part of the signal strength can escape is upward, when it will be deflected back to earth at a distance by the Heaviside layer.

"This upward movement of the signals is compared to the action of a lawn sprinkler which sends its spray upward and outward so that it is distributed at a distance, but not immediately around the source," said Mr. Evans.

The method of attuning several stations to a signal wave is that of generating a frequency at one station and supplying it to one or more other stations by either wire or radio facilities. At the stations supplied with the synchronizing frequency it may be multiplied sufficiently to be put on the air as a carrier wave, in which case it will be exactly or almost exactly in step with the carrier wave of the original station. Methods which do not depend upon wires or radio to carry the frequency generated from one to the other stations are not deemed by engineers to be satisfactory.

Both in New England and at Chicago, synchronization projects of the Westinghouse Company use wire connections. At one time KDKA at Pittsburgh and KYW at Chicago were synchronized by sending the carrier wave from the former to the latter station on a short wave length. In this experiment, trouble caused by fading of the transmitted synchronizing wave was avoided by the insertion of a mechanical link in the circuit at each station, which functioned to carry over during the period of fading. However, it is agreed that the short-wave method of maintaining two or more transmitters in exact electrical step is in the experimental stage, while the wire method is more thoroughly tested.

DOES BROADCASTING PAY?

FOLLOWING the inference by Senator Dill at the Couzens Senate hearings that broadcasters in general and Station WLW at Cincinnati in particular were making big money, in response to an inquiry as to whether this was true, Powel Crosley Jr., owner of the station, said:

"We do hope some day to show a small profit from our broadcasting operations and tremendous investment therein, but as income increases it goes back into better and better programs and more and more operating cost. The public benefits."

Senator Dill, reading to the Senators from a standard rate guide, said that the price per hour at WLW was $800, which he understood was to be raised to $1,000, which, if true, might at the latter figure bring as much as $28,000 revenue a week. The Senator declared that high power was not the sole factor in securing a high rate, pointing to Station WOR of Newark.

"Here is a 5,000-watt station so well regulated and so well situated that it is able to get $750 an hour for its time," Senator Dill said, "against WLW, a 50,000-watt station's $800 an hour."

PAID FOR TALKING

It was brought out last week that, while William Hard receives $100 a week for one fifteen-minute political news event broadcast for the National Broadcasting Company, David Lawrence receives no compensation for broadcasting his weekly fifteen-minute talk for the same company.

Frederic William Wile for his fifteen-minute weekly talk over the Columbia Broadcasting System is paid $175 per week, according to W. S. Paley, president of the system.

All three are Washington newspaper men, Lawrence and Hard with The Consolidated Press and Wile has his own syndicate.

THE PENTODE TUBE IS SEEN AS KEY TO FUTURE PROGRESS

New Bulb Is Said to Be Three Times as Powerful as the Screen-Grid — Engineers Are Seeking a Perfected Circuit for It

AN alternating current five-element tube known as the Pentode has been introduced by the Ceco Manufacturing Company. It is said to be three times as powerful as the screen-grid and is called the greatest advance in radio since the three-element tube was introduced in 1906 by Dr. Lee De Forest.

The new tube is described as being a sort of double screen-grid, having a screen around the plate, as is the case with the screen-grid of the present; also another screen between the control grid and the cathode. The insertion of this second screen permits a greatly increased amplification; three to four times as great as the screen-grid.

"The public has been asking for receiving sets," said Ernest Kauer, president of Ceco, "which do not employ so many tubes. This new development makes it possible to build sets which will satisfy that demand. Bringing, as it is bound to do, more simplicity into radio manufacture and receiver operation and maintenance, it will reduce manufacturing costs, material costs and therefore costs to the radio public. It means less tubes per family, but a great many more families will own receivers," he said.

"There is nothing revolutionary about the five-element, or so-called Pentode tube," said a representative of the RCA Radiotron Company. "It has long been in regular use in Europe, but with radio sets of less advanced design than are in general use in this country. However, our radio tube engineers have been working to perfect its characteristics so that it may be made acceptable as a still further contribution to the improvements in set design, but this will require still further development by engineers both in the set branch as well as the radio tube branch of the industry. Its interest to the public, therefore, is in the possible future use rather than in any immediate application. When this tube shall have been perfected it will not in any way supersede standard types of AC tubes."

STRAUS TO GREET AMERICAN PEOPLE

Viennese Composer, Invited to Conduct Broadcast Tonight, Playing Excerpts From "The Chocolate Soldier"

OSCAR STRAUS, Viennese operetta composer, has been invited to greet the American public through WEAF's coast-to-coast broadcast tonight at 9:15 o'clock. He is in New York for a stay of five or six days before proceeding to Los Angeles, where he will write operetta scores for motion pictures. He will conduct the concert orchestra tonight in excerpts from his own works, "The Chocolate Soldier" and "A Waltz Dream."

Albert Spalding, violinist, will also be heard as a guest artist. He will play a violin made in prison by Joseph Guarnerius—one of the famous family of Guarneri that made violins in the time of the original Stradiveri. This is the favorite instrument of Mr. Spalding.

"The maker of Spalding's instrument was suffering from a bad case of remorse for riotous living and boistrous conduct when the urge to make a perfect violin came upon him in his prison cell," said a representative of WEAF. "Making love to the jailer's daughter, he pursuaded her to smuggle materials for making a violin to his cell. The instrument Spalding uses most frequently was the result. It had many distinguished owners between the time it was completed early in the eighteenth century, and the time it reached the skilled hands of the American concert artist."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Do the Entertainers Lose Their Salary When an S O S Silences the Broadcasters? — How Long Should Antenna Be If Lead-in Is 100 Feet?

QUESTION—I have often wondered if the radio artists lose their salary if an S O S stops the performance or prevents them from going on the air.—J. K. W. ANSWER—An S O S may stop the broadcasting along the Atlantic Coast, but the inland stations continue on the air. The performance is sent to them by land wires. The program sponsor does not have to pay for time on the air at stations which do not broadcast. The artists are paid because they naturally devote their time to the program. If the signal is flashed to resume broadcasting after an S O S, they must be ready to go on the air immediately if they are booked for only one station silenced by the distress call. The entire network, however, is never affected by an S O S. For example, all stations along the Pacific Coast might be silenced by an S O S in that region, but not the transmitters east of the Rockies.

QUESTION—You have expressed the opinion in your interesting columns on several occasions that the length of aerial should be from seventy-five to 100 feet, "including the lead-in." In a case where the lead-in itself is necessarily upward of 100 feet in length, what kind of lead-in would you advise using and what length of aerial?—T. S. K. ANSWER—Try from thirty to fifty feet antenna proper and use a .0001 mfd. fixed condenser in series with the lead-in and the receiver; that is, connect the lead-in to one terminal of the condenser and the receiver's antenna binding post to the other terminal of the condenser. This is called a series condenser. It has the same effect as shortening the antenna to permit sharp tuning. If you find that the stations overlap when the antenna is fifty feet long and the lead-in 100 feet, try the series condenser to make tuning selective.

QUESTION—I live at Miles City, Mont., and enjoy my screen-grid radio set and phonograph combination, but what can I do to shut out interference from a telegraph central office across the street? I live on the top floor of a hotel. (2) My ground wire is attached to the steam radiator. Is this a detriment? (3) What can be done to improve daylight reception?—L. C. A. ANSWER—Detach the antenna wire from the receiver to determine if the telegraph interference is being brought into the set by way of the antenna or over the power wires. If the trouble ceases when the wire is disconnected, it indicates that the antenna is picking it up. Otherwise the remedy is a power line filter connected between the light socket and the receiver. (2) No, but a cold-water pipe attachment is generally better. (3) Try a higher and longer antenna and be sure that the tubes are not worn out.

QUESTION—I am the possessor of a new electric screen-grid receiver. I have two antennas—one an outside wire and the other a so-called light socket antenna. The set is thrown from one to the other by a simple switching device. With the electric light circuit as the antenna the set ceases to function if the ground wire is disconnected. With the outside wire the volume is increased with the ground wire disconnected. Can you explain the change? (2) Why do I receive stronger signals generally on the light socket antenna than on the outside wire?—T. D. W. ANSWER—A correct solution would entail a series of engineering tests with suitable apparatus. A filter in the lighting wires which carry power to the receiver, connected between the light socket and the set, should simplify the condition. The filter will probably make the set receive best with either antenna system with the ground wire connected, which is as the designers intended. (2) The lighting wires are picking up more radio energy, probably because they are longer and better exposed to the broadcast waves.

QUESTION—I have one of the latest types of alternating current operated receivers, which is linked with a magnetic loud-speaker. However, I wish to improve the tone. Is it possible to do so by using a dynamic loud-speaker instead of the magnetic one now employed? (2) How would such a speaker be attached to my receiver to give the best results, since the set uses only one 171 tube in the output stage. (3) Would the degree of improvement warrant the change?—W. L. R. ANSWER—Yes. (2) The type of dynamic applicable to your set is one which secures the power to operate its powerful magnet from the alternating current lighting mains independently from the receiver, but having two other wires which are plugged into the receiver at the regular place. There are sensitive dynamics on the market designed to give plenty of volume from one 171 power tube. If more sound is desirable, have a radio technician equip the receiver with a special output jack following the first audio tube and plug into this output a special unit which uses a larger power tube than the 171. The speaker, of course, must then be attached to the new power device.

QUESTION—I recently purchased a six-tube receiver using 199's and a 120 power dry battery tube. My antenna wire is fifty feet long inside the room. I cannot seem to get loud-speaker volume except on WOV, a few miles away, and one or two other near-by transmitters. Can you suggest something to cure my trouble?—A. S. MacK. ANSWER—Try an outside antenna wire, say seventy-five feet long or more, erected so that the horizontal part or "flat-top" wire is as high as possible above surrounding buildings. Use a 22.5-volt "C" and 135-volt "B" potentials to get full power from the 120 power tube.

WGBS' NEW WAVE FREE FROM INTERFERENCE

STATION WGBS has now thoroughly tested its new wave. The management of the station has established listening posts in various parts of New York and Long Island and has requested its listeners to comment upon transmission over its new 600 kilocycle wave with particular reference to possible interference, change in signal strength and quality. If the many letters received are a criterion, the new wave is vastly superior to the old one, according to Dailey Paskman, the director.

The programs are reported to be coming over loud and clear and no interference with any other stations observed. The new wave fills one of the vacant spots on the dial between WEAF and WNYC.

TRADE NOTES AND COMMENT

Radio Wholesalers to Hold February Convention in Cleveland—Plans Are Maturing for Trade Show at Atlantic City

REPRESENTATIVES from more than forty local associations will be present at the forthcoming convention of the National Federation of Radio Associations to be held at the Statler Hotel, Cleveland, Ohio, on Feb. 10 and 11, according to Michael Ert, president. Peter Sampson, president of the Radio Wholesalers Association, has extended an invitation to over 900 radio wholesalers to be on hand for the conclave. The Ohio Trade Association of Cleveland is the official host for the convention.

An illustration of the progress made in radio is demonstrated by the increase in the volume of business of the Stromberg-Carlson Company in 1929, which shows a gain of 50 per cent over 1928, according to Roy McCanne, president of the company.

"Business continues good. The year 1929 was our best telephone year, and our best radio year also," said Mr. McCanne. "The radio volume has increased about 50 per cent year by year, and 1929 will show that increase over 1928. In six years' time our radio volume has grown to the point where it now exceeds our telephone volume, which we have spent thirty-five years in developing. These two lines of business fit together admirably, the telephone peak coming in the Spring and Summer, the radio peak in the Fall and Winter. Having these two lines of work has enabled us to carry out our long-established aim of keeping a standard sized force of high-grade workers continuously busy. In the last six years our organization has gradually grown from 800 to 1,800 workers."

"When our sales figures showed over a 52 per cent increase for the year 1929 over the previous year, we felt more convinced than ever that Stromberg-Carlson policies of production and distribution are based on fundamentals vital to safety in pioneering a future in a new industry," said Ben Gross, president of Gross-Brennan, Inc., Stromberg-Carlson factory sales agents in New York.

The Triad Manufacturing Company of Pawtucket, R. I., makers of radio tubes, have completed negotiations with the Radio Corporation of America, whereby they are licensed to manufacture radio tubes under all patents now controlled by the RCA and to manufacture under any future patents which may be granted to these companies.

Edwin K. Cohan, radio engineer, has been appointed technical supervisor of WABC and the Columbia Broadcasting System, according to William S. Paley, president of the broadcasting system.

The latest in modern radio apparatus will be displayed to the trade by about 300 of the manufacturers at the annual Convention and Trade Show of the Radio Manufacturers Association, to be held at the new civic auditorium in Atlantic City early in June, according to a representative of that organization.

There will be 85,000 square feet of exhibition space available for the trade show in the auditorium. The principal displays will be on the main floor. This acreage, 45,000 square feet, will be used for exhibition booths.

ESKIMOS ENJOY RADIO INSTALLED IN IGLOOS

RADIO is extremely popular with the Eskimos and the time is not far off when there will be a radio set in every igloo, according to Staff Sergeant M. A. Joyce of the Canadian Mounted Police, stationed at Chesterfield Inlet, in the northern part of Hudson Bay.

"It will not be long before the Eskimo will be demanding radio from the traders in payment for their furs or labor," said Sergeant Joyce. "It is quite a common sight to see a number of them collected in the mission here listening to the music over KDKA."

ATWATER KENT RADIO

EVERY one of our Atwater Kent sets has been a thoroughbred. Every one a family friend.

We got the first one in 1923, seven years ago. It was one of those "open models." It would look funny now, like an old Cadillac, or the Wrights' first airplane. But it was the best radio in the world at that time.

Then we got an A. C. set when that came out two years ago, and regretfully we packed up the old battery set and sent it to my father, who lives on a farm without electricity. It works just as well as ever, after seven years. That's the way Atwater Kent builds them.

"It's our fourth Atwater Kent"

The A. C. set was a corker. I suppose we'd still be using it if we hadn't read that Atwater Kent had perfected the Electro-Dynamic speaker. We went right down to the store to hear it.

For the first time we heard on a radio the whole range of an orchestra—the high notes and the full, rich bass notes. It was a new delight, and we had to have it.

But now, Atwater Kent has revolutionized everybody's radio ideas again by bringing out the Screen-Grid set. When we first heard it at a friend's we were speechless. Such power and such tone! Then more power! Our friend astonished us by bringing in stations 'way out on the fringe of things—stations so far away that we hadn't even known they existed. Not thin little squeaks, either, but clear and true, with wonderful warmth of tone.

That was all we needed. Next day we had the man in the store send up this Screen-Grid cabinet set. We couldn't bear to part with our old one. It had served us too well. So we put it upstairs in a bedroom as second best.

Let me show you how this new one works. I'll turn on the big local station. Oh, a band! Hear all the instruments? Every one! No blurring! Ta-ta-tah! Ta-ta-tah! Can't you see the leader waving his baton? And listen while I turn down the power. There! You can scarcely hear the band, but it's just as true as when it was loud. That's control, isn't it?

Let's try another station. See, I hardly turn the dial at all, but the big local station is out, and another is in. I don't know what it is.

There's the announcement. Why, it's KMXL! That's 1500 miles away, and wouldn't you think it was right here in town!

Of course, you've noticed this cabinet! It's hard to tell which is more beautiful, the cabinet or the tone. And yet the price was not high. Every time we have bought a new Atwater Kent, we have been pleasantly surprised at the price. It wasn't the price that sold us, though. It was the radio.

MODEL 1055. Screen-Grid Radio of superb performance with a low-boy cabinet of distinction, adaptable to any room in any home.

RADIO CALLS OUT TO YOUNG AMERICA

Limitless Opportunity Exists, Says Terrell—He Likens Radio Unto the West to Which Greeley Pointed

"GO into radio, young man!" Such might be the modern version of Horace Greeley's famous advice if he were alive today. For, as the West once was a land of limitless opportunities for energetic youth, the field of radio today is almost as sparsely settled and holds even more certain promises of a productive return, according to William D. Terrell, chief of the Radio Division of the Department of Commerce, who is one of the veterans in the new art. And he was speaking for young men who have not talent for providing entertainment via radio. The wider opportunities and enlarged incomes that have come to these theatrical folk through broadcasting is common knowledge.

"The radio industry is far ahead of the supply of trained men in the field," said Mr. Terrell. "We have well paying positions in the government service that are going begging because there is no one to fill them. The industry is combing classes of college graduates in engineering and pleading with them to enter the radio field. Even in the government service the salaries range from $2,400 to $6,000 a year for inspectors, operators and their assistants, and in the industry some of the top men receive wages that would challenge even Rudy Vallee's income."

Today the Radio Commission has three positions unfilled because of the scarcity of trained radio engineers. They are the posts of chief engineer, which will pay $10,000, and two assistants, which have salaries of $7,500. There are eight or ten vacancies in the government inspection service, which probably offers the greatest lure for young men who are eager to learn as much as possible about the general technical field of radio before they specialize.

"We've had to take everybody who has taken the examinations," Mr. Terrell said, "and even then we have not been able to keep the vacancies filled."

Opportunity to Travel.

A government radio inspector not only comes in contact with almost every kind of radio device, but he has the opportunity of traveling as well. A force of about 120 men keep a constant check on broadcasting stations and radio devices on ships which enter American ports, and because of the shortage of inspectors they jump about from one section of the country to the other.

The job of a radio operator aboard a ship offers even wider opportunities for travel and adventure. After a few years of operation of this kind the operator can easily get a place in the industrial field and settle down if he so desires. For those who wish to go to the top of their vocation there are chances to specialize in the medical or legal profession. There are, for instance, experts on tubes, on antenna, and the like.

The opportunities in radio are not limited to the engineering and the entertainment fields, however, as an increasing number of young men are discovering. A lucrative territory is opening for lawyers with some knowledge of radio engineering. This field is so promising that Bethuel M. Webster Jr., chief counsel, and Paul M. Segal, his assistant, of the Federal Radio Commission, recently resigned positions which paid $10,000 and $7,500, respectively, to start a private practice in radio law. And Louis Caldwell, another former chief counsel of the Radio Commission, and Frank Scott, who recently was a United States Representative, are reaping large rewards from this specialization. As yet no courses in radio law are being offered in standard law schools. In fact, there is little radio law in books. So new is the art and so conservative are the makers of law that it will probably be years before there are complete textbooks on the subject. The courts will have to establish precedents. Meanwhile, the pioneer lawyers are deriving substantial incomes while they help make radio law.

At present there are approximately 7,000 licensed commercial operators, practically all of whom are employed, according to J. H. Barron, radio inspector in charge of commercial operators, Department of Commerce. The demand is rapidly increasing, he said, as new radio telegraph services are opened, such as those authorized by the Universal Wireless Communications Company, the Radio Corporation of America, and the Mackay interests. The 2,300 ships under the American flag employ about 3,500 operators, according to Mr. Barron, and many of the vessels will soon have to double their shifts in accordance with the new provisions adopted last Summer by the Safety of Life at Sea Conference in London.

The 350 point-to-point radiotelegraph stations in the United States employ about 700 operators; the 600-odd broadcasting stations about 1,000; the 101 transocean stations some 500; the 77 ship-to-shore stations about 300, and the 180 experimental stations approximately 300. Then with the opening of as yet unknown possibilities in television and visual broadcasting, the field will continue to expand. In fact, the young man who goes into radio can rest assured that he will always be in demand if he has ability.

PUBLIC SERVICE THE KEYSTONE FOR SUCCESSFUL BROADCASTING

THE success of broadcasting depends upon the support given to it by the public and upon the sale of time for sponsored programs, according to William S. Paley, president of the Columbia Broadcasting System, who called attention to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce that the supreme power that regulates broadcasting is the people—the millions who listen in.

He said that the applause, the criticism and suggestions from the invisible audience constitute the greatest and most effective regulation that can be applied to the microphone. A slight twist of the wrist and a listener may vote for or against a broadcaster, so the minute and possibly even the second that a broadcaster displeases the public it polls a negative vote, which is quickly relayed and promptly heeded. Mr. Paley pointed out that 78 per cent of the Columbia system's operating time is devoted to service programs and that only 22 per cent is used by program sponsors.

The Winning Factor.

"The winning principle of American business is competition," said Mr. Paley. "Columbia has won its position in its field by rigorously striving to excel. This competition has been of almost inestimable benefit not only to network broadcasting but to every listener at American firesides. I will be the last man to oppose any broad, constructive legislation relating to broadcasting, which I feel is fraught with public interest. I pledge the fullest assistance to bring about improvement. The very genuine interest and careful study your committee is giving to this subject is an indication that no hasty or ill-advised legislation will be passed.

"The one thing I hope above all else is that no legislation will be enacted which will prevent us from continuing on a sound business basis. We must necessarily keep uppermost in our minds the need of rendering real public service, which I construe as the keystone of any successful business enterprise. We have found ourselves able to devote approximately 70 per cent of our time on the air to service, as contrasted with sponsored programs.

"Most sponsors have come to realize that the public will tune out if too much advertising is inserted," said Mr. Paley. "They now are voluntarily refining their presentations to a point where the briefest announcement of sponsorship is prevalent among the largest and most successful broadcasting advertisers. In addition to the improvement of advertising programs, we are now able to furnished regularly to each of our seventy-one associated stations well-balanced programs."

"China and the Powers" will be presented over the WEAF system by James G. McDonald tomorrow night at 7:15 o'clock.

CANADIAN OFFICIALS BEGIN HUNT TO FIND NON-LICENSED SET OWNERS

CANADA is out to prosecute erring radio fans who have failed to buy a radio license. The order has gone forth from Ottawa, and now the radio supervisor at Toronto is issuing his instructions to the radio inspectors to check up among the listeners and check up on those who have and those who have not paid their annual license fees.

For the past few years as the fiscal year of the Radio Branch, Department of Marine and Fisheries, draws to a close with the 31st of March, radio inspectors accompanied by constables of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have made door to door canvasses of various sections of city and country. They are about to ask once more to see the license which each radio-listening family is by law required to have. Many listeners will be able to produce the certificate which costs one dollar a year and brings the government more than $200,000 in revenue every year. Others who cannot will have their names taken, their story to be checked by the official records at Ottawa, and if no license has ever been taken out by the family instructions will be issued from Ottawa to prosecute, which means a fine up to $50 in the local police court.

It is reported that less than half the listeners in the Dominion have licenses. Supervisor S. J. Ellis at Toronto states that out of sixty-five homes visited in one day in one district of Toronto, fifty homes were unable to produce licenses. Radio dealers and the postoffice sell the licenses, the revenue from which is used to combat inductive interference with a staff of trained experts equipped with a fleet of twenty automobiles throughout Canada.

RADIO IN AUTOMOBILE CALLS FOR AN ORDINANCE

WITH the introduction of radio as part of the standard equipment of an automobile, a traffic authority in Washington, D. C., predicts that ordinances will quickly follow to prevent radio being operated while automobiles are in motion in cities.

"It takes no great imagination," he said, "to picture what might happen in traffic along Fifth Avenue, or better still, on Michigan Boulevard, in Chicago, where it moves faster, if a hundred or so radios were playing. The driver needs his eyes and ears to drive with and should not be subject to any temptation in the way of radio distraction.

"Music in the car might make him miss hearing the horn of an approaching automobile or fire or ambulance siren. Imagine fifty automobiles in a city street broadcasting a football game! Such a thing as this, I am sure, would not be tolerated by city traffic authorities.

"Hereafter, however, those late to the football games and caught in the jam will not have to worry if they get stalled alongside a country road."

LISTENERS TO SALUTE FLAG AS CURTIS LEADS IN PLEDGE

Vice President to Open Series of Broadcasts Designed to Inspire Patriotism and Greater Love for the Stars and Stripes

RADIO will be put to a new use with the inauguration of a series of broadcasts which will bring to millions of American children messages designed to stimulate patriotism and promote greater honor to the American flag. Vice President Charles Curtis will open the series on Feb. 4, when he will deliver an address on "Our Flag: Its Story and Its Message." Others scheduled to participate in these patriotic broadcasts are General John J. Pershing, Secretary of Labor James J. Davis and George W. Wickersham. The programs are being presented under the joint auspices of the National Flag Association and the National Broadcasting Company.

A feature of the initial broadcast will be the pledge to the flag in which the Vice President will lead the millions of children who will be invited to listen in. It is believed that this will be the first time that children in all parts of the United States will simultaneously deliver the pledge to the Stars and Stripes.

Marine Band to Play.

The United States Marine Band will play patriotic airs on each program. During the course of the series the following speakers will be heard: On Feb. 11, George W. Wickersham, chairman of the National Commission on Observance and Enforcement of Law, will speak on "The American Flag, Symbol of Good-will." James M. Beck, member of Congress, former Solicitor General of the United States, will discuss "The Constitution and the Flag" on Feb. 18. On Feb. 25 Mrs. Ruth Bryan Owen, member of Congress and daughter of the late William Jennings Bryan, speaks on "Old Glory's Greatest Glory."

General John J. Pershing will be heard on "The Anthem of the Flag" on March 4; James J. Davis, Secretary of Labor, will discuss "The Flag and Opportunity" on March 11, while on March 18 Mrs. J. Borden Harriman's topic will be "Serving the Flag." All of the programs will originate from Washington.

"In these programs the America of today will speak in the America of tomorrow through the spirit of the American flag," James A. Moss, president general and originator of the organization, said. "Young America, listening to the voice of 'Old Glory" will hear of the country's past, present and future."

Raymond L. Ditmars, authority on reptiles and curator at the Bronx Zoological Gardens, has been invited to speak over the WJZ network tonight at 8:15 o'clock. His topic is "A Tropical Adventure."

Charles S. Dewey, financial adviser for the Government of Poland, will be principal speaker at the Merchants' Association luncheon in his honor to be broadcast through WEAF's network Wednesday afternoon at 1:15 o'clock.

"Recent Tariff Legislation" and "New Trends in Business" are the topics to be discussed over WEAF's network by W. M. Kiplinger and John T. Flinn, respectively, on Tuesday night at 7 o'clock.

The Connell Vocal Quartet, Carl Weinrich, organist and Leonid Bolotine, violinist, will participate in the ninth recital to be broadcast by the Curtis Institute of Music. The concert will be available for listeners in tune with WABC's system on Friday night at 10:30 o'clock.

Winnie Lightner will bring her bag of tricks from musical comedy and the screen to the microphone when she sings a number of lively airs over WABC's chain at 10 o'clock Wednesday night.

IT has remained for telephone engineering to reveal the true beauties of tone latent in electrical phonograph records, the method of whose making was also developed by telephone engineers.

The new No. 654 Stromberg-Carlson Radio-Phonograph Combination not only plays records with radio's finest tone, but also gives you every latest radio advantage known in broadcast reception. And both these advantages are combined in a single cabinet smaller than is usually required to hold a radio set alone.

For homes of limited room area but unlimited artistic musical taste, the new No. 652 low, compact Console Radio Receiver offers to lovers of fine broadcast reception alone, full size Stromberg-Carlson performance in the smallest compass yet achieved.

These instruments, together with models Nos. 641, 642 and 846 offer a range of choice in Stromberg-Carlson Receivers to suit every taste and purse.

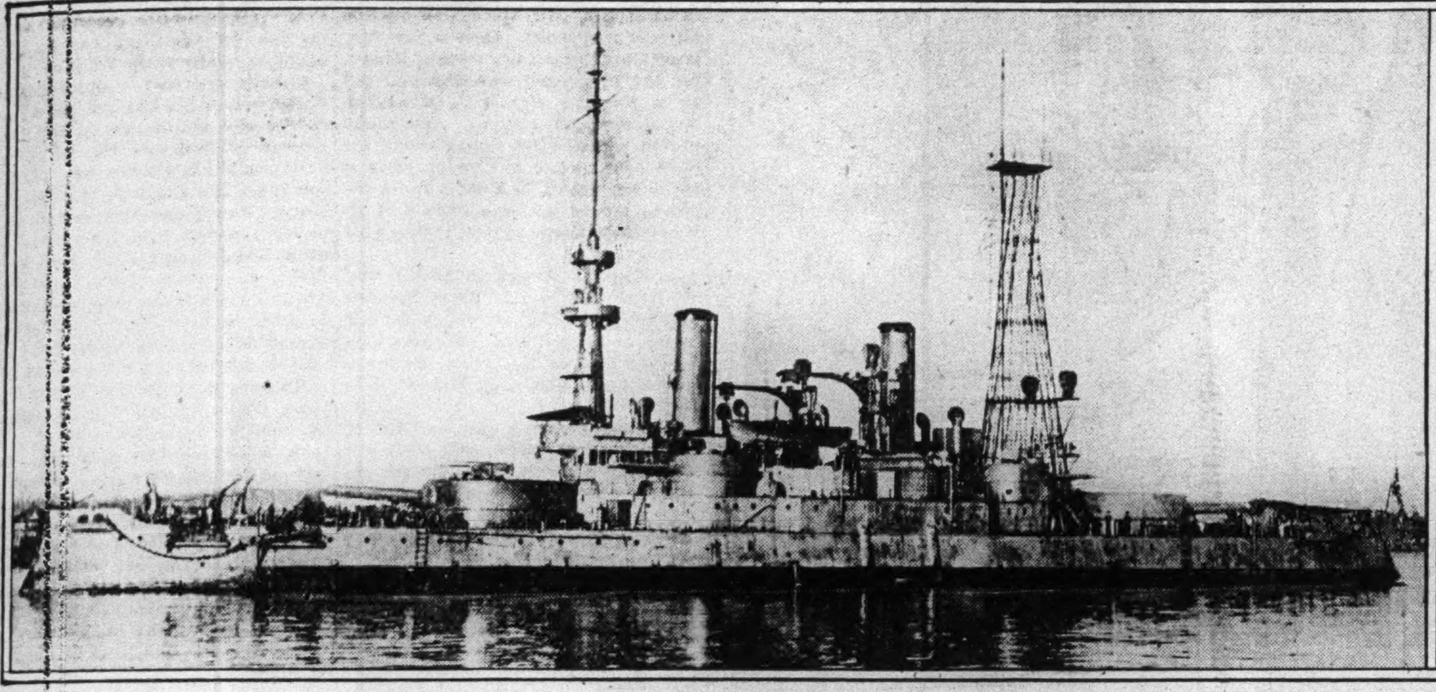
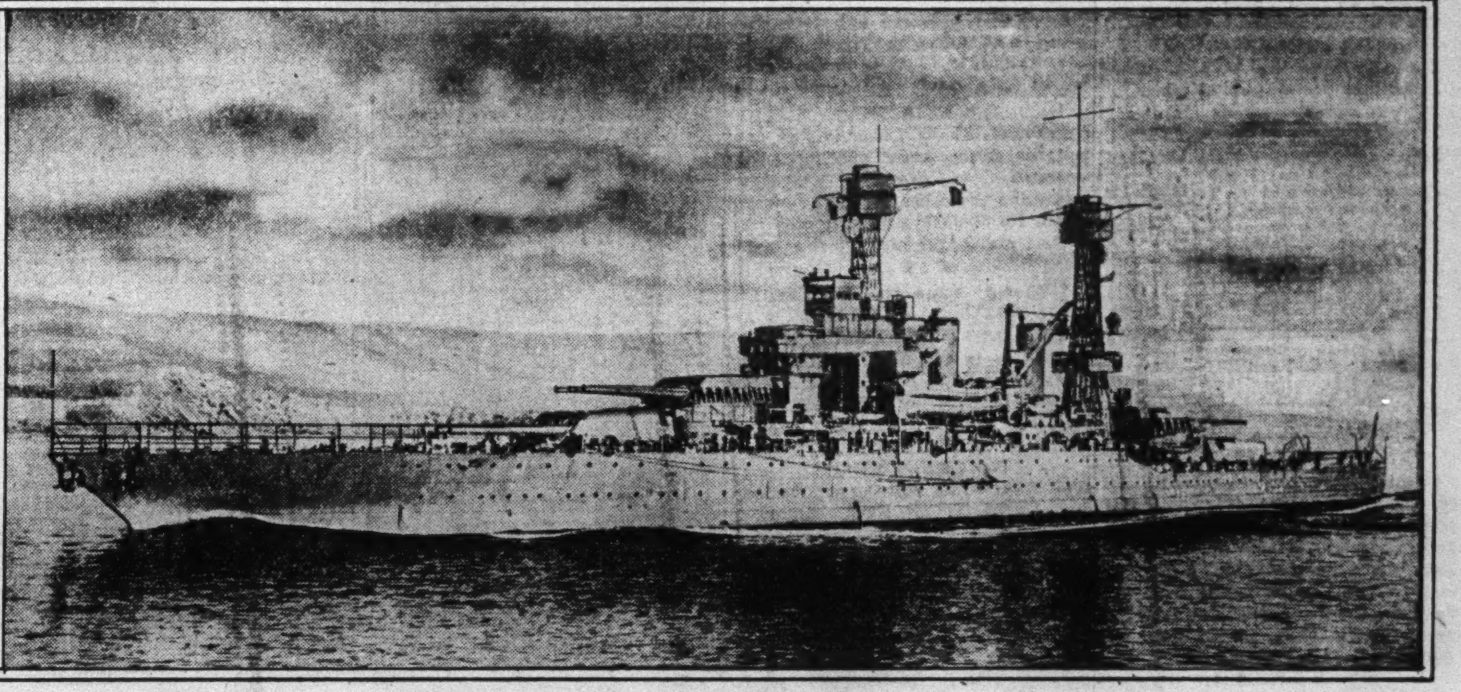
THE GROWING COST OF NAVAL ARMAMENTS

Representative French Outlines the Heavy Burden Laid Upon the American Taxpayer and Says the London Conference Can Devise a Limitation Plan That Will Cut the Expenditures in Half





Thirty Years Ago and Today. At Left—The United States Battleship Oregon, Pride of the American Navy During the Spanish-American War, Cost $5,914,021.90 and $300,000 Annually to Maintain and Operate. At Right—The Battleship California, Pride of the Navy Today, Whose Cost of Maintenance and Operation Is Approximately $2,200,000. Replacement Cost of Such a Ship is Estimated to Be About $35,000,000 to $40,000,000.

FROM the standpoint of saving in national budgets, the London naval conference has great importance for those who pay the taxes and those who vote the money for the world's fleets. In the article below this phase of the navy question is taken up by the Chairman of the Sub-Committee for Naval Appropriations of the House of Representatives, who holds out hope for a cut of 50 per cent. in the outlay through international agreements.

By BURTON L. FRENCH.

WASHINGTON.

WHAT good can come from from the London Naval Arms Conference? That question has been asked me over and over during the past sixty days as I have had part in programs and forums where the general subject of the London conference has been under consideration. In large degree it is the question of the tremendously earnest man or woman who desires limitations, but who is controlled by one of two ideas, or both: First, that the subject-matter for the conference is too limited; or, second, that the United States will not become a member of the League of Nations or agree to any sanctions in advance, without which they feel the conference must fail.

Let us consider the two objections before taking up what I believe can be accomplished by the conference.

To those who say that the subject-matter is too limited, that the conference is called upon to deal with piffle in comparison with the great world problems that are at stake, that it is called upon to consider symptoms and not disease itself, I answer by saying that I recognize that the question of armaments is not the only problem upon which world peace depends. I grant that there are other disturbing issues that must be met and adjusted, the overlapping of populations with respect to existing and ancient boundary lines, financial obligations, ancient grudges and jealousies, aspirations of groups within existing governments, the unsettled doctrine touching seaborne trade and many more.

Granted that these problems should be determined, I submit that the problem of armaments in the way it will be handled at the London conference can be separated in part from any and all of them. Indeed, may make it easier for the settlement of other problems, since one of the elements that disturbs the peace of the world at all times—the cause for fear—in part will be removed. I grant that were the other problems to which I have referred disposed of, the problem before the London conference would be simplified.

It seems impossible that one conference could consider and dispose of the whole gamut of problems that disturb international accord, and if the purposes for which the conference has been called can be realized measurably, the results will be reflected in a most happy way upon every other cause of difference among world peoples.

In reply to the second objection, that the conference is foredoomed to failure because the United States has not indicated its willingness to adhere to the League or Nations or to subscribe to mandates or sanctions in advance, it need only be recalled that the whole history of the United States is replete with leadership in advocacy of the doctrine of adjustment through conciliation, of arbitration and peaceful methods of determining disputes, and that the object of the conference is not in conflict with the objects of the League.

Statesmen Agreed.

If anything further need be said on the question of the world's right to expect that the conference will mean another step toward more satisfactory world conditions, I need only suggest that the five nations who are parties to the conference under no consideration would have entered into an understanding through which the conference has been brought about—Great Britain through issuing the invitation and the United States, Japan, France and Italy through accepting it—unless the statesmen of these several countries had been profoundly impressed with the wisdom of the course.

The London conference has been called to consider whether or not the five powers who are parties to the Washington armaments treaty of 1922 may devise ways and means of still further restricting or reducing their armaments.

This seems a fair outline of the purposes of the conference as gathered from the call of Oct. 7, 1929, and from the joint statement of President Hoover for the United States and Prime Minister MacDonald for Great Britain of Oct. 11 following.

Last year the organized military forces of the nations of the world, including the reserves, aggregated nearly 30,000,000 men. During the last fiscal year the naval budgets of the five powers, parties to the Washington conference, were close on to $1,000,000,000; that of the United States was more than $374,000,000.

Following the Washington conference, for six years as chairman of the Naval Appropriations Committee of the House, I have reported six supply bills carrying a grand total of more than $1,800,000,000 for the support of the navy of the United States, or on an average considerably mo.e than $330,000,000 per year. Unless a way may be found to do teamwork in naval programs in both construction and maintenance, the annual naval budget of the United States soon will pass the $400,000,000 mark. This is inevitable. As a matter of fact, it should be cut in two, and can be cut in two.

But some one says: Did not the Washington conference count for anything?

It did, and but for that conference the budget for the navy of the United States would be in excess of $500,000,000 annually.

The Washington conference did these things:

1. It limited the total and individual tonnage of capital ships and reduced existing and authorized tonnage.
2. By this program it made possible reduction of auxiliary craft.
3. It limited the total and individual tonnage of aircraft carriers.
4. It limited individual tonnage of all other types or categories.
5. It limited size, and, in part, number of guns.
6. It worked out a replacement program for capital ships.

The Washington conference did not

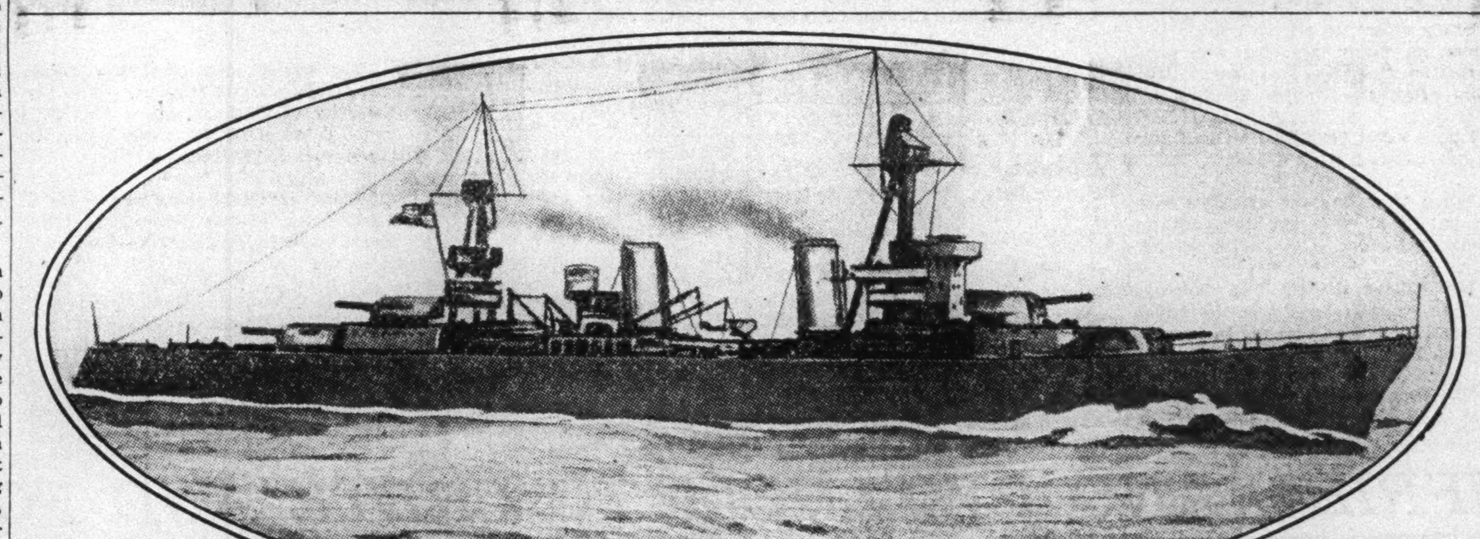
1. Limit the number of ships other than capital ships and aircraft carriers.
2. Adopt a comprehensive replacement program.

Any nation may build an unlimited number of cruisers or destroyers or submarines or other types of ships of less individual tonnage than capital ships. The very lack of understanding touching all the types of ships other than capital ships and aircraft carriers has made possible a naval race that is now on among the powers signatory to the treaty. This race has come about through fear and national pride. Before the London conference there lies a possible program that embraces within itself two factors of profound significance—greatest international security and greatest savings to national budgets.

A definite understanding ought to come from the conference that will touch every type of ship not restricted in the Washington conference treaty.

In view of the Kellogg-Briand peace pact outlawing war, which has been ratified by practically all the nations of the world, including all the major powers, the London conference ought to abolish capital ships and fix the maximum tonnage of all other categories at conservative figures.

When national security has been provided and a reasonable contribution made to insure orderly government throughout the world against sporadic acts of lawless elements, then there can be no defense for the expenditure of a single dollar or the utilization of a single life upon a naval program.



From a Drawing.

U. S. S. Pensacola, One of Our New 10,000-Ton Cruisers, in Course of Construction. Authorized Limit of Cost, $16,750,000.

The arch-stone in the program is definiteness, definiteness in categories of ships of all types, definiteness in all major factors having to do with the defenses of nations.

Unless from the conference shall come definiteness in ships that may be constructed by the participating nations, then at once as to the category that may be unrestricted will enter competition.

For instance, if agreement be reached in all categories, excepting submarines, then the submarine will become the glorified ship, and building programs calling for more and more submarines will follow. And so of cruisers, and so of destroyers. Fear will serve to inspire the race. This is precisely what happened following the Washington conference. There was no limit upon number of cruisers, and, as a result, a mad expansion in cruiser strength was soon under way. Following the Washington conference, and omitting all reference to the present fiscal year because of certain suspensions, the powers signatory to the treaty have laid down and appropriated for ships of this type, as follows:

Great Britain	15
United States	8
Japan	9
France	5
Italy	5

Authorization for greater programs has been voted (the United States 15) and definite drives are on that they be increased.

The imperative need of nations has not been the impelling power behind this movement. An essential, if not the driving force, has been the preachments and activities of other nations.

There should be reasonable limits within categories. The reason the Geneva conference failed is that the conferees could not come to an understanding with reference to the needs for ships of the different types. But needs are not absolute. They are measurable, and no matter what limits are fixed, in event of a major war they would be expanded.

The world outlook today in view of the Kellogg-Briand peace pact and certain Continental adjustments is such that Great Britain seems to feel that she does not need seventy cruisers, as she thought she needed at Geneva, but that she could get along very nicely with fifty. But her needs will depend upon adjustments touching submarines and possibly other considerations.

Limitation within categories should not be upon the basis of the maximum strength of the nation that predominates in a particular type, as for instance, the cruiser strength of Great Britain, the destroyer strength of the United States and the submarine strength of the United States or Japan or France. Such an agreement would mean limitation upward and not downward and would add millions to the naval budgets of all the nations for new construction work and millions more for maintenance. When I stress the importance of reasonable limitations within categories, I have in mind money savings. Limitations of any degree might remove fear, but only moderation in terms will effect economies.

Let the figures tell the story:

The construction cost of one 10,000-ton cruiser is about $17,000,000, but that is only the beginning. Upon the basis of cost of operation and maintenance of the Memphis, a 7,500-ton cruiser, the annual cost to maintain a 10,000-ton cruiser would be $1,250,878.

Were the United States to build thirty cruisers of 10,000 tons, the cost would be $170,000,000 and the annual cost of maintenance about $37,500,000. More than that, the life of a cruiser is limited and the entire original investment would need to be repeated again in another sixteen or twenty years. Similar studies may be made of other types.

The aircraft carriers Lexington and Saratoga, 33,000 tons each, cost to build approximately $41,000,000 and $43,000,000 respectively. The 13,000-ton aircraft carrier authorized to be constructed by the last Congress will cost not less than $19,000,000.

The operation and maintenance costs of the Lexington and Saratoga are staggering.

It costs to build one submarine of 3,000 tons $6,000,000. To operate and maintain this craft for a year costs approximately $436,000. Apply these figures to the entire naval establishment—a pencil, tablet, a problem in arithmetic and an astounding result!

Place of Battleships.

The time has come to remove the battleship from the fleets of nations. Regarded as the backbone of the fleet for many years, its position has been challenged by the advent of submarine and aircraft. Battleships are floating forts that would not be used to protect commerce, and were they brought into action at all it would be against battleships of another power or in making a combined assault.

Naval critics whose opinion cannot be blown down the wind do not hesitate to say that in event of a major war battleships would be anchored in safest harbors, there to await the eventualities of the contest.

The cost of one battleship is about $35,000,000 to $40,000,000. The United States has eighteen battleships to be replaced by fifteen under the terms of the Washington treaty. That means a total replacement cost of nearly $600,000,000. In my judgment, it will be in excess of this figure. But, here again, it is not "the original cost but the upkeep."

The cost of maintenance and operation of the battleship California last year was $2,219,052.40. At this rate, to operate the eighteen would cost nearly $40,000,000 for a single year.

The Washington conference limited the total tonnage of aircraft carriers for Great Britain and the United States in the figures 135,000 tons each. Japan, France and Italy were granted ratio tonnage.

At this time the United States has standard aircraft carrier tonnage in the amount of 76,286 tons, of which the Langley represents about 12,000 tons and is an experimental ship that will naturally give way to a later type, and the balance of the tonnage is made up of the Lexington and Saratoga of between 30,000 and 33,000 tons each. The United States has authorized and appropriated for one aircraft carrier of 13,800 tons. Great Britain has 92,850 standard tonnage in aircraft carriers. She is constructing or has appropriated for 22,500 tons additional. Japan has a total of 68,870 tons built, building and appropriated for. France has one carrier of 21,653 tons and Italy none at all.

Aircraft Carrier Limitation.

It is conceivable that the maximum aircraft carrier tonnage could be reduced. This might depend upon the program touching battleships and other types. It will need to be borne in mind that an aircraft carrier is a combined floating field and repair shop for airplanes. Having in mind the effective radius of operation of military planes and the impracticability of limiting the airplane strength of nations on account of the possibility of rapid transformation of commercial planes into planes of measurable military value, it would seem that one of the ready means of limiting the air power of nations against nations that are separated by vast stretches of sea is by limiting aircraft carriers. Unless contingencies develop that do not now appear, it does not seem likely that there will be a reduction of the Washington figures touching aircraft carrier strength.

In the matter of cruisers, destroyers and submarines there are two factors that it seems to me are imperative if we are to have a limitation in naval armaments that will mean reduction of naval budgets.

First, there should be definiteness in tonnage in these categories whether upon the global tonnage plan or a plan that would be specific as to each category, or a combination of the two; and

Second, the limitations as to tonnage should be in reasonable amounts and not upon the basis of the maximum tonnage of the nation that at the present time has the greatest

Construction, Maintenance and Operation of This Powerful Submersible Exceed Comparable Expenses of the Battleship Oregon of Spanish-American War Fame. At Right—The Aircraft Carrier Saratoga; This Vessel and Her Sister Ship, Lexington, Are the Largest of Their Type in Existence. The Saratoga Cost $40,948,011.44; Her Annual Maintenance and Operating Costs Amount to $2,300,000. Sober Second Thoughts On Things and Kings, And, Once Every So Often, Cabbages

By L. H. ROBBINS.

Speeches at Dawn.

I WOKE before the morning, I was sleepy all the day,
But I heard the King of England, three thousand miles away,
And silver-tongued MacDonald and (all in French) Tardieu,
And Stimson, yes, and Ralston, and other statesmen, too.

The household heard me tuning in, and, groaning in their beds,
They uttered words derisive and covered up their heads.
The milkman at the window looked puzzled and amazed;
I wonder what his thought was—he was grinning as he gazed.

To those who scoff at rising before the break of day
For parliaments of all the world, I have but this to say:
The consciousness of rectitude is nothing to abhor,
And you have to get up early if you get the jump on war!

Great good has already come out of the naval conference. A KING, A JUDGE —AND SOME OTHERS

A Few Footnotes on Some Personalities Whose Names Have Appeared in the Headlines

By S. T. WILLIAMSON.

THE other morning a bearded man in his sixties stepped to a microphone in London. He wore a coat once known as a Prince Albert, a coat rarely seen in this country on any one but a fundamentalist preacher or an undertaker's assistant. Other unusual features about his attire were his trousers, which were pressed down the side instead of fore and aft, and a broad diamond studded ring through which was passed his fore-in-hand tie. His voice was carried all over the world. Only a few sentences were heard in far-away Japan, for the broadcast was drowned out by a Russian pianist in a nearby Soviet Siberian station. And many people in the United States would not have heard when a wire broke in a receiving station had not a radio engineer picked up both ends and allowed the current to pass through his body.

In 1776 the American people cast off King George III. Last Tuesday the voice of another King George came in to millions of American homes. It took 154 years, the miracles of radio and King George V to do it, however.

Certainly no King ever had before such a casual audience. It might have been a gigantic pajama party—a few million people in kimonos or bath robes, slippers or mules, shaving scap or curl papers. Those who did not listen in observed in those who did a strange air of exaltation which may have been partly pride in having arisen so early and partly that peculiar curiosity about royalty displayed by the people of a republic. Those who did listen in were so thoroughly experiencing the exaltation that few of them may have observed it in others.

Thus, millions of Americans now feel a speaking acquaintance with King George and would like to know him better. Like the people who were twiddling dials at 6 o'clock Tuesday morning, King George scowls at static, too, and wonders why nearby stations drown out more attractive distant ones.

But radio is not the King's only hobby; he rides many. One of his more unusual hobbies in a collection of baby pictures. The King owns album after album of photographic prints—comic, serious, all moods and all colors. His finest collection, however, is of postage stamps. Probably there is not a more valuable one in the world than can be found in King George's albums. It is probably his misfortune that he is past the joys and disillusionments of sifting through a packet of "one thousand mixed," but he takes great pleasure in arranging his collection himself.

Another of the King's accomplishments is shooting. King or no King, George V is perhaps Britain's best wing shot. His form has been commented upon, but he downs more game than any of his critics and he has been known to drop three birds in the same flight, one bird coming, one bird overhead and one bird flying away. This deftness with the shotgun is a poor argument for the anti-cigarette people. They cannot attribute the King's steady hands and nerves and keen eyes to non-smoking, for he has been an inveterate smoker of cigarettes. He did swear off once—for three days. No enterprising advertising agent ever will get his cigarette testimonial, for the King has his own brand specially made for him.

A keen eye and a quick trigger finger behind the shotgun and an accurate eye and a steady hand behind a billiard cue has the King. True, he needs glasses, but only for reading. His fondness for detective stories, how Queen Mary bought him mystery novels in a British edition of a 5-and-10-cent store have been told in the cables. What is not generally known is the King's devotion to naval history. He has one of the largest private libraries in existence on this subject, and this gives all the more emphasis to the feeling the King displayed last Tuesday when he mentioned the pride all nations took in the traditions of their navies.

If he could have had his way, doubtless King George would have remained in the Royal Navy. He served as a naval officer for fifteen years, part of the time on the North Atlantic station, and he looks back to those days of the 1880s and early 1890s as among the happiest of his life. He is the one King who would be a jack.

VERY often it seems that life in the army is one inspection after another. It will be just that for a youngish Brigadier General now packing up at Fort Hamilton, because he has just been appointed Inspector General of the United States Army.

Hugh Aloysius Drum is his name and he is the youngest Brigadier in the army. His father before him was an officer. A Drum was killed scaling Chapultepec, and another, the General's father, was killed on the slope of San Juan Hill. The army cannot get along without a Drum.

Hugh Aloysius Drum was literally born in the army—at an army post in Michigan. His father had been in the regular service since the Civil War. In the middle 1890s he was detailed to New York as military instructor at St. Francis Xavier College down on Sixteenth Street, where young Hugh Aloysius became a cadet. When the Spanish War began and Captain Drum sailed for Cuba, Cadet Drum entered Boston College. When Captain Drum was killed, President McKinley's letter of consolation to Mrs. Drum offered to appoint one of her sons a Second Lieutenant. Although Hugh Drum was only 19 and two years under age, he received a commission. He deserved it, for two years later he was promoted to First Lieutenant.

Wherever the American Army was in action—the Philippines, Cuba, Vera Cruz and Chihuahua—Hugh A. Drum was, too. He was General Funston's Chief of Staff and General Pershing took him with him to Mexico and to France. When the first American Army was formed in the Summer of 1918, General Drum was made its Chief of Staff and under him were prepared the plans for St. Mihiel and the 45-day grind from the Argonne to the Meuse.

FIGURING in headlines at the same time as the London conference which may cut down the American Navy is Chief Magistrate William McAdoo, who was instrumental years ago in developing the modern navy. Now his hands are full keeping subordinate magistrates in order, investigating their conduct and writing them tart letters of censure. In the middle 1880s he was a member of the House Naval Affairs Committee which put through the legislation during the first Cleveland Administration which built the famous White Squadron.

Magistrate McAdoo was born 77 years ago in County Donegal, Ireland. He came to this country when a boy, studied for the law and served eleven years in Congress. As a reward for his interest in the new navy President Cleveland appointed him Assistant Secretary of the Navy. At that time a young man named Theodore Roosevelt was Police Commissioner of New York and turning the department inside out. When President McKinley succeeded President Cleveland the young Police Commissioner took Assistant Secretary McAdoo's desk in the Navy Department. A few years later Mr. McAdoo was appointed New York's Police Commissioner and occupied Theodore Roosevelt's desk for a lively year. He is the only living man who served as Police Commissioner who still holds an official position, and based upon his police and court experiences one of the most feeling of his many written articles is one entitled "Listening to Liars."

FROM DUMFRIES AND PWLLHELI TO CRETE AND PONDOLAND

PLACES in the news of the past week are identified with men famous in history and literature. A city in Scotland is the burial-place of that country's favorite poet and the scene of an exploit of one of her greatest fighters. In this country, a region in the gold-mining West, where a disastrous snowslide recently took place, was made memorable by two of America's great humorists. Other places recall a vast pre-Roman civilization, the closing battles of the Civil War, and an epoch in New England's Colonial history.

Echoes of feudal days were recently heard in Dumfries, Scotland, when a Baroness claimed tribute from the tenants of her ancestral estate in the district. Two names famous in Scottish history are connected with Dumfries. In the church of the Greyfriers Convent Robert Bruce slew the "Red Comyn" in 1306. Another Robert, the poet Burns, came to Dumfries in 1791 and lived there until his death in 1796. His grave in the churchyard is covered with a domed mausoleum which contains also the remains of his wife and three sons. Burns's favorite resorts, the Globe Inn and the Hole in the Wall, contain relics of the poet. Connected by the Old Bridge, built in the fifteenth century, is the suburb of Maxwelltown.

The entire population of forty-three persons on little Bardsey Island received recently their first supplies of tobacco and meat in five weeks, according to reports from Pwllheli, Wales. Storms and gales had cut them off from the mainland. In the vicinity of Pwllheli are a primitive fishing people, many of whom speak only Welsh. There is fine coast scenery near by, especially at Braich-y-Pwll, the "Land's End" of North Wales. Bardsey, two miles from the headland, is the traditional burial-place of 20,000 saints and was formerly a resort of pilgrims. It contains the scanty remains of an abbey. Ancient customs are still preserved at Bardsey, and it is more or less patriarchally ruled by a "king" whom it elects.

A society to help poor brides and to promote earlier and healthier marriages among the working classes has been formed at St. Gall, Switzerland. At the site of this city the famous Benedictine Abbey was founded, in 613, as a hermitage by St. Gallus, a companion of St. Columba, and was established as an abbey in 720 by Othmar the Aleman. The abbey was suppressed in 1805 for a time. St. Gall, the town, arose during the tenth century, and in 1454 joined the Swiss Confederation. It attained great prosperity from the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries, and in 1846 became the seat of a bishopric. In addition to the abbey, it has fine museums and other buildings.

Fire has destroyed part of the city of Canea, capital of the island of Crete, in the Mediterranean south of Greece. Legends of Crete tell of the great King Minos, son of Zeus and Europa, and of the voracious minotaur, slain by the Greek hero, Theseus, with the aid of Minos's daughter, Ariadne. History, formulated through achaeological research, tells an eloquent tale of empire and sudden tragedy. Before the pyramids were built the Cretans were using copper and making fine pottery jars. From about 3400 to about 1200 B. C., more than 2,000 years, Crete was a great empire. Her sailors ventured far to sea, established trade and colonies. The leading city, Knossos, flourished, and its king was ruler of the island, with a large staff of officials, mechanics, jewelers, artists and laborers at his command. But a mysterious catastrophe—foreign invasion, rebellion or earthquake—overwhelmed the island about 1400 B. C. and the great palace at Knossos was plundered and burned.

Four men were recently killed in a snowslide in the mountains near Sonora, Cal. Around Sonora is a mining belt whose rich placers brought the first great rush of settlers, "the 'Forty-niners," to the West and which is identified with the writings of Bret Harte and Mark Twain. Many of the place-names still survive—Slumgullion, Tuttletown, Jackass Hill, Roaring Camp, Poverty Flat, Angels Camp and Red Dog. On the site of a little cabin on Jackass Hill Twain is believed to have written "The Jumping Frog." Harte's writings, "The Iliad of Sandy Bar," "The Luck of Roaring Camp," "An Heiress of Sandy Bar" and "How Santa Claus Came to Simpson's Bar" had their settings in this land.

A network of tunnels was recently dug up at Fort Stedman, Va., which was part of one of the Union redoubts built by General Grant in his siege of Petersburg in 1864-65. Around Petersburg were fought the bloody deciding battles of the Civil War. The siege was a sequel to the Wilderness Campaign, and began in the Summer of 1864. Lee's forces stood off the attacks of General Meade and other Federals, and Grant extended his line westward, building Fort Stedman and other strongholds. Flank attacks and cavalry raids continued for months, and Lee's men were weakened by the severe Winter of 1864-65. Richmond fell the next Spring and the Confederates, with their line of retreat cut off, surrendered at Appomattox Court House in April.

A scientific expedition sponsored by Princeton University is preparing to study physical, chemical and biological conditions on the huge marine plateau off Andros Island, in the Bahamas. Andros is a land of wild character, with green forests never penetrated by white men, containing beautiful flamingos and precious woods. It is named after Sir Edmund Andros, whose rule in New England is a storied period of colonial history. He was arrested by angry colonists in 1689 and led chained through the streets of Boston, in an early expression of the spirit of independence which less than a century later resulted in the Revolution.

Not far from Mukden, Manchuria, is Mount Lushan, one of the twelve sacred mountains of China, the temples of which in past centuries were the goals of imperial pilgrimages. Now, reports have it, brigands have seized the grottos and use them as prisons for their captives held for ransom. Lushan is a rugged place, and in olden times every cliff was ornamented with a temple. A famous Chitan, Yehlituyu, who rose to power under Ghengis Khan, selected this mountain, according to legend, to be "the eternal trustee of wisdom," and buried 10,000 sacred books under the peak of the mountain. Above it he erected the temple which is today a bleak ruin.

Rioting at the Crown Mines, near Johannesburg, South Africa, has been laid to a secret society of natives from Pondoland. Knives, cudgels and bricks were used by the 500 natives, and more than a dozen were killed. According to reports, this rioting had an intraracial origin, following that of last Fall at Durban. Pondoland, which became part of the Cape Colony in 1894, is on the southeast coast of Africa and has about 75,000 inhabitants, most of whom are natives. North of it are wild Zululand and Basutoland, this tableland country being the haunt of rhinos, lions and other man-killers.

A subject which is out of the news at present, but an issue with every Spring, has finally been brought to a local conclusion at Auckland, New Zealand. This is daylight saving, and it has been adopted, the season there being Summer now. Auckland, a city of some 200,000 inhabitants, is beautifully situated at the mouth of an arm of Hauraki Gulf, its harbor being one of the best in that dominion. It has fine parks, a large university and a noted zoo. Auckland was founded in 1840 as the original capital of New Zealand, but the seat of government was moved to Wellington in 1865.

THE SOVIET'S AMAZING INDUSTRIAL EXPERIMENT

Under the Five-Year Plan the Bolsheviki Are Striving to Increase the Output Of Factories and Farms—Past, Present and Future of Russian Industry

IN the following article, an attempt is made to picture the industrial progress made by Soviet Russia under its amazing Five-Year Plan. In every instance the figures used are those officially given out by the Soviet Government.

By GEORGE H. COPELAND

MORE than a year ago Soviet Russia put into execution the most extraordinary enterprise in the economic history of the world. This was the five-year plan, designed to bring about an advance in the process of transforming a predominantly agricultural country, with some 150,000,000 inhabitants, into one of the world's leading industrial powers. Under the plan it is proposed to stimulate and regulate the output of important industries, as well as the progress of agriculture, of trade and commerce, of cultural and social welfare, for each of the five years ending with the fiscal year 1932-3.

It is now possible to measure the advances made under the plan so far and to compare the present situation of Russia with what it was before the World War.

The idea behind the five-year plan is nearly a decade old. The Bolsheviki decided some time ago that they must be self-supporting in order to survive, that capitalistic countries would sooner or later meet economic disaster because of the increasing demands of labor, that conflicting economic interests of nations would bring on new and destructive wars, and that the entire capitalistic structure was doomed.

The "plans" were put into effect as aids in the struggle to secure self-sufficiency. They gave the country a concrete program, a definite goal. In 1921 the fifteen-year plan for electrification, fathered by Lenin, was initiated. Annual plans for increasing production were then undertaken from 1924 to 1927, when a five-year plan was tried. This plan, and the five-year program begun in 1927, were found to be too conservative. Consequently the present five-year plan was put into effect on Oct. 1, 1928.

All lines of production are included in the five-year plan. Russia must have food for her own people, and for export if possible. Therefore the productivity of the farms must be increased. To accomplish this, modern methods of agriculture must be introduced; the mujik must have tractors, combines and fertilizers. All this means imports, factories, raw material, power, skilled labor and transportation. The ramifications of the program of industrialization are endless. And if a link in the chain breaks, the whole is endangered.

Vast Undertakings Ordered.

The Gosplan (State Planning Commission of the U. S. S. R.) has the task of laying out the program and of attending to its execution. This organization was created about seven years ago by the Council of Labor and Defense, the highest economic organization in the country, which has the power of veto or approval of the Gosplan's reports.

Vast undertakings have been ordered for the period 1928-9 to 1932-3. The total power—mechanical, electric and animal—to be produced by 1932-3 is set at a figure 77.6 per cent above that of 1927-8; the output of fuel, 82.3 per cent higher; of iron and steel, at three times that of 1927-8. Production of machinery, of textiles and tractors must be greatly increased. Transportation must be reorganized; a new chemical industry must be created. Agriculture must be largely socialized.

Dispatches from the Soviet Union in recent months have been confusing and conflicting. They indicate a shortage of food in some places, a lack of the ordinary household necessities—soap, matches, fat—in others. They emphasize the difficulties of making a capable factory executive out of the unmethodical Slav, of satisfying both peasant and city dweller, of inculcating industrial efficiency in a land where the idea of time has little or no meaning.

Russia's vast distances, the many races welded into the union, the general poverty, superstitition and ignorance of a large part of her populace, and the disintegration of her economic situation following the World War, the blockade, civil wars and the famine of 1921—all have combined to make the achievement of the task extremely difficult. In order to understand the present situation and to weigh Russia's chances of succeeding in her aims it is necessary to list and evaluate her resources and to trace the economic distance already run since pre-war times.

The Soviet Union covers an area of about 8,300,000 square miles, one-sixth of the land surface of the globe. From its western border to Vladivostok is 6,400 miles; from Baku to Archangel is a 2,250-mile journey. Great rivers are there, to be harnessed for their water power; wide plains make the country one of the world's granaries. Its frozen tundras yield valuable furs and timber.

Russia's coal reserves have been estimated at more than 400,000,000,000 metric tons of anthracite and bituminous. Rich deposits of iron ore abound, enough to supply her for several hundreds of years. About 35 per cent of the world's oil reserves are believed to be within her borders. Russia ranks first in the production of platinum and high in reserves of other minerals—manganese ore, asbestos, gold, copper, silver, lead and precious stones.

Russia in 1913 must be pictured as a largely agricultural State, with some industrial production, but depending mainly on imports for finished goods. Tools, metal products, cottons and woolens came from abroad. She imported yearly large quantities of agricultural implements, axes and scythes, and about 12,000 automobiles. Her agricultural surplus paid for these imports. Germany furnished Russia with the greater part of her imports, and also with technicians for her factories. Raw materials, such as hides, were sent abroad and shipped back in the form of boots and shoes.

The industrial geography of the Czar's empire was artificial, with industrial centres at great distances from the sources of their raw materials. To make this worse, transportation was defective. In 1914 Russia had about 20,000 locomotives, of which 5,000 were more than twenty years old and only 7,000 less than ten years old. There were only about 40,000 miles of railways in the country, and the great waterways were undeveloped.

The first economic effect of the World War was the closing of the chief frontiers through which passed almost the whole of Russia's foreign trade. Two and a half years after the outbreak of war her exports had fallen to one-ninth of the pre-war totals. The breakdown in foreign trade affected internal industry. Most of the imports received went to the War Department, and the requirements of the army brought about a "goods famine." The village began to feel the emptiness of the markets, and the peasant began to bury his grain. By 1917 the farmers were satisfied if they could supply themselves with food and clothing; it did not pay to produce a surplus. Industry and transport as well as agriculture were strangled by the cessation of foreign trade.

On Nov. 7, 1917, the Bolsheviki seized control of the Russian State. They immediately set out to fulfill their revolutionary aims, to socialize the means of distribution and production, and to seize the land. Plans were made for establishing large-scale "Soviet farms" as rapidly as possible. The metallurgical and coal industries were promptly nationalized.

The Treaty of Brest-Litovsk was signed in 1918 and took away much land, coal, railways and population formerly a part of the empire. There followed the so-called cordon sanitaire of the Allies. Civil war, attacks by Kolchak, Denikin and Yudenitch came next. Then came the severe drought and famine of 1921.

Period of "War Communism."

In these desperate circumstances the country applied military methods to industry and agriculture. Economic life was organized upon the basis of "war communism." In the period from 1917 to 1920 private ownership was abolished in land, forests, mines, most industrial undertakings, shipping, inventions, libraries, church property, &c. In this period of war communism, production showed a downward tendency.

Workers received scanty supplies of food. Faulty industrial equipment, and a lack of raw materials and fuel slowed up the output of factories. Production of coal fell to 25 per cent of pre-war by 1920; ore to 2.25 per cent, engines to 14 per cent, and chemicals to about 6 per cent. The gross production, industrial and agricultural, in 1920-1 was figured at 9,500,000,000 rubles at pre-war prices, compared with a figure of 20,040,000,000 in 1913.

In 1921 the revolt of the Kronstadt garrison indicated to the Soviet government the failure of its economic policy, especially of its food dictatorship. War communism had failed; production hit its lowest point. The answer was the New Economic Policy. Freedom of trade was restored to industries employing fewer than twenty persons. Cooperatives were restored to a self-governing basis. A definite grain tax of 10 per cent was substituted for the former levy. Concessions were granted to foreign capitalists. Large establishments were organized into trusts, to operate on a self-governing basis. Control of large-scale industries, of finance and foreign trade, was retained by the State.

The New Economic Policy was announced as being only a temporary measure, and in recent months the news dispatches have indicated that the Soviets, under the leadership of Joseph Stalin, are returning to the aggressive "war communism."

In spite of various internal political disturbances, the war on the "Nepman," the kulak or rich peasant, and the bureaucrat, and the low productivity of the worker, the five-year plan proceeds. Since 1921 production in general pointed steadily upward until the 1913 mark was passed late in 1927. In determining the progress made under the plan, production before 1917 must be measured by figures given out by the Czarist Government; after that the only figures available are those supplied by the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

In 1913 the output of all industry was valued at 8,430,000,000 rubles, of agriculture at 11,610,000,000; total production value, 20,040,000,000 rubles. By 1920 these figures had shrunk more than 50 per cent, but in 1927-8 they were given us as 10,080,000,000 for industry, 12,260,000,000 for agriculture—a total of 22,340,000,000 rubles.

The output of coal, petroleum, peat, textiles and industrial crops in 1927-8 was, according to Soviet figures, well above that of 1913. Production of agricultural machinery in 1927-8 was given as 186.6 per cent that of the pre-war level; electric power (Lenin's fifteen-year plan was completed in eight years) 259.6 per cent that of 1913. Railway mileage in the same territory was 30.5 per cent higher than in 1913, and railway traffic 14.4 per cent larger.

There is still a considerable deficiency in grain production, which, if it should assume a protracted character, would become a threatening factor in the face of the rapid growth of the population and the requirements of rapid industrialization. Total grain production in the past few years, according to official figures, has fluctuated between 90 and 96 per cent of that for the five years 1909 to 1913.

The iron and steel industry, in addition, was not restored to nearly the pre-war level. In 1927-8 the production of iron ore was given as 62 per cent of the 1913 figure; of manganese ore, 56.6 per cent; pig iron, 78.6 per cent; steel ingots, 95.2 per cent, and rolled shapes, 91.4 per cent.

The five-year plan offers an extremely ambitious program for the future. It is proposed that the total capital investments for the period 1928-9 to 1932-3 shall be 64,600,000,000 rubles, more than twice that of the preceding five-year period. Basic capital, as ordered by the Gosplan, is to be increased from 70,500,000,000 rubles in 1928 to 127,280,000,000 rubles in 1933. Vast changes in production, in industrial efficiency, in the agricultural system are to be attempted.

The Gosplan has not disregarded the questions of labor personnel and the cultural welfare of the people. It proposes to raise the whole mass of skilled labor to a higher technical level, with 1,000,000,000 rubles to be spent toward this end, and by 1933 to have 2,806,000 workers—of whom 55 per cent will be skilled—in the industries regulated by the Supreme Economic Council. The same situation holds in agriculture. Social insurance and labor protection are to be provided, according to the plan, as well as shorter working days and better wages. The Gosplan has even figured out the 1933 budget for the worker's family—real income, public health, housing and the progress toward complete literacy.

INDUSTRY IN AMERICA AND RUSSIA

IN the approaching historical period the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics aims to attain and surpass the economic level of the advanced capitalistic countries, thus assuring the triumph of the socialist economic system. Some idea of the distance still to be run may be gained from the table below, which lists present production in important industries in the Soviet Union with that of the United States, as well as production plans of the Soviet for the fiscal year 1932-3.

*It is expected that these figures will be revised upward by the Supreme Economic Council.

DETAILS OF THE PLAN

In the following paragraphs the 1913 status, the present situation and the future program in various key industries are set forth, official Soviet figures being used.

FOREIGN TRADE.

Soviet Russia's foreign trade is still far below the pre-war level. In 1913 it totaled 2,641,000,000 rubles. The total was given as 1,299,000,000 in the fiscal year 1924-5, and from then on showed a steady but slow increase, being in 1926-27, 1,510,000,000, and in 1928-9, 1,713,899,000 rubles.

Exports dropped from 1,501,000,000 rubles in 1913 to 784,000,000 in 1927-8. Imports followed a similar course—1,140,000,000 in 1913 and 945,000,000 in 1927-8. A noticeable decrease took place in grain exports, which in 1913 amounted to 10,661,735 metric tons, and in 1927-8 to 590,119 tons. Other items, such as fur and oil, showed large increases. Timber exports were smaller. A favorable balance of trade has been reported for 1928-9.

Soviet trade with America was reported much larger in 1929 than was the empire's in 1913; it amounted to $155,000,000, as contrasted with $48,000,000.

As for the future, it is proposed to increase Russian exports almost 165 per cent in the five years, to attain a total of 2,047,000,000 rubles in 1932-3. Under the plan, imports are also to be increased, the 1932-3 figure being expected to reach 1,705,000,000 rubles. In pre-war years, agricultural products amounted to 80 per cent of the total exports. In 1932-3 it is planned to have agricultural exports about equal to industrial exports.

ELECTRIC POWER.

The Soviet Union has made the electrification of industry one of its major reconstructive aims. In 1913 the output of electric power from public utility plants was 690,000,000 kilowatt hours. In 1925-6 this was given as 1,560,000,000 kilowatt hours and in 1927-8 to 2,479,000,000 kilowatt hours.

The output of all electric power in the fiscal year 1927-8 was reported to be 5,100,000,000 kilowatt hours, and in 1928 to be 6,500,000,000 kilowatt hours. With the economic growth of the country envisaged in the five-year plan, the annual power requirements are expected to be, by 1933, at least 22,000,000,000 kilowatt hours. The total length of the electric transmission systems (20,000 volts and above) is to be increased from 3,000 to about 13,000 kilometers.

The amount of capital investments required in order to accomplish this expansion is estimated at 3,100,000,000 rubles, plus another 1,000,000,000 rubles for power installations in individual industrial enterprises. The amount to be invested in electric development will thus form some 24 per cent of the total investment in industry.

PETROLEUM.

The crude oil production in 1913 was 9,234,000 metric tons. The industry was particularly hard hit by the prolonged World War and the civil wars. At Baku and Grozny, the most important fields, production was practically stopped. Equipment at the time of nationalization was of a primitive sort; skilled workers, means of transportation and finances were lacking. Oil production dropped more than 50 per cent between 1913 and 1921.

Nationalization of the industry halted the decline in output. By about 1926 it had reached pre-war levels, and since then has steadily increased. Production in 1927-8 was given as 11,700,000 metric tons, and in 1928-9 (estimated) 13,700,000.

The plan for the development of the industry between 1929 and 1933 provides for nearly doubling the production, that for the last year of the period being scheduled to reach 26,000,000 metric tons, which figure may be increased to 40,000,000. This development is expected to involve capital investments of from $850,000,000 to $900,000,000.

IRON AND STEEL.

The iron and steel industry has not yet caught up to the pre-war level. The supply of pig iron falls far short of demand. In 1913 iron ore production amounted to 9,214,600 metric tons; in 1924-5 it was given as 2,132,800; in 1925-6 3,306,600; in 1927-8 6,000,000, and in 1928-9, 7,100,000.

Steel production was given as 4,246,900 metric tons in 1913, 3,591,600 in 1926-7, 4,156,000 in 1927-8, and 4,800,000 in 1928-9. The planned output for 1929-30 is to be 5,500,000 tons.

The industrialization of the country demands a rapid expansion of the metal industries and the iron industry is scheduled to increase its output to three times that of pre-war years within a short time. According to the five-year plan the steel output is to reach 10,841,000 metric tons in 1932-3, and the production of iron ore is to reach 19,400,000 metric tons. At present the upward revision of this schedule by 25 per cent is being considered.

TRANSPORTATION.

The growth of production provided for and the accompanying development of new regions will result in heavy demands upon transportation, especially upon railways.

In 1913 the length of railway lines was 58,500 kilometers. In 1924-5 the Soviet reported the figure had risen to 68,609 kilometers, in 1925-6 to 73,465, in 1926-7 to 74,662, in 1927-8 to 75,942 and in 1928 to 77,128 kilometers. The revenue from the railroads in 1913 was given as 985,000,000 rubles, in 1927-8, 1,698,710,000 rubles.

According to the five-year plan, a total of 6,700,000,000 rubles will be invested in railways up to 1932-3, and in the final year it is expected that 94,000 kilometers will be in operation. The total length of the railways under construction in 1929-30 is given as 11,039 kilometers.

Russia has made considerable progress in aviation. There were no air lines in 1913, but in 1924-5 they were officially stated to be 4,984 kilometers in length, and in 1927-8 as 11,427 kilometers.

MACHINE CONSTRUCTION.

The metal and machine industry forms the pivot on which the entire plan of economic reconstruction rests. Success in raising the productivity of labor depends upon its success, and the five-year plan provides for the investment of about 1,000,000,000 rubles for capital construction in the machine-building industries.

In pre-war Russia this industry occupied an insignificant place. In 1913 the value of the output of agricultural machinery (rubles at pre-war quotations) was put at 60,000,000 rubles, in 1927-8 at 132,000,000. Electrical apparatus and supplies showed a similar increase. Between those years the output of plows increased, according to Soviet figures, from 768,500 to 1,169,400, while drills, reapers and thrashers also showed a large gain.

Development of the machine-tool industry will require for the five-year plan an investment of 25,000,000 rubles for new plants alone. Car-building plants are expected to require about 160,000,000 rubles, locomotive works 100,000,000 rubles. The new automobile plant at Nizhni-Novgorod will cost about 140,000,000 rubles. Investments for the production of agricultural machinery will be about 180,000,000 rubles. Large factories for the production of tractors will be built to raise the 1927-8 output of 1,218 to about 75,000 a year.

FUEL.

The production of fuel, coal, peat and fuel oil has passed the pre-war level, but still must be greatly increased to keep pace with the industrialization program. In 1913 the coal output was given as 29,053,100 metric tons; in 1924-5, 16,742,500 tons; 1925-6, 25,715,000; 1926-7, 32,018,100; in 1927-8, 35,400,000; 1928-9, 40,600,000, and in 1929-30 the planned output is 50,600,000 tons.

The output of peat was less than 2,000,000 metric tons in 1913. This output was reported to have been more than triple that amount in 1927-8. Production of fuel oil, at about 4,000,000 metric tons in 1913, was put at approximately the same level in 1927-8 and increasing steadily.

It is emphasized that under the five-year plan the fuel supply shall not limit industrial progress in any way. The total production of coal is scheduled to reach 75,000,000 metric tons in 1932-3 and of peat 16,000,000 tons. The production of wood for fuel, which reached 50,500,000 cubic meters in 1927-8, is scheduled to reach 59,800,000 cubic meters in the last year of the five-year plan.

CHEMICALS.

The status of the Russian chemical industry before the World War was even below that of the generally low level of Russian industry as a whole. Production of acids amounted to only 309,000 metric tons in 1913, and this level was not reached again till 1926-7. Pre-war production level of superphosphates was reached about 1925, of soda about 1926-7. In recent years the value of the chemical goods produced, including perfumery, fats, drugs, matches and rubber goods, is reported to have been rapidly increased.

The five-year plan provides for increasing the output of the chemical and allied industries by 1933 to three and one-half times that of the past year. It is planned to produce 7,000,000 metric tons of fertilizers by the end of the period. The output of superphosphates is scheduled to reach by 1933 more than twenty times the production of 1927-8. During the five-year period investments for construction, expansion and repairs in the chemical trades are expected to reach 1,367,000,000 rubles.

AGRICULTURE.

In socializing agriculture and in inducing the 125,000,000 peasants to adopt modern methods of large-scale farming, the Soviet Government has encountered many difficulties. The grain production of the country in proportion to the population is still below the pre-war level, according to latest figures.

For ten pre-war years the average grain production was 73,600,000 metric tons. The average yield for ten pre-war years multiplied by the area under cultivation in 1913 was 78,400,000 metric tons. The latest figures for 1928-9 put the grain production at 76,250,0000 metric tons. In 1924-5 the grain production was given as 73,000,000 metric tons; in 1926-7, as 73,120,000, and in 1927-8 as 74,280,000 metric tons.

The five-year plan aims to increase grain production to 99,660,000 metric tons by 1933, and to resume exportation of grain in fairly large quantities by about 1931. It purposes to supply agriculture with technical equipment through the aid of industry, to improve the status of the

HOOVER'S PHILOSOPHY STATED IN HIS SAYINGS

His Formulas for Dealing With Many Problems Are Found in Speeches, Articles and Letters Collected by the Department of the Interior

WASHINGTON.

IN the Department of the Interior is a file case that so far as its contents are concerned is different from any other in Washington. It is gradually filling up with white cards twelve inches by six. On each card are from one to half a dozen or more quotations from Herbert Hoover, listed as "striking utterances of the President." They are being assembled by a government secretarial staff. The period covered is largely the years that have elapsed since the beginning of the World War—a period in which the name of Mr. Hoover, because of his relief activities in the war-stricken areas of Europe, became almost overnight a world-wide household word.

The quotations are mainly from non-partisan utterances—public speeches to various organizations, articles in newspapers and magazines, reports written by Mr. Hoover and in some instances his private letter files. It is the first time in the history of the country that notable words of a President have been assembled in this form. When finished the whole will consist of many chapters to be published eventually in book form.

All through the file runs the dominant thought of child welfare, a subject closer than any other to the heart of the President. The search for truth in the solution of national problems, the building up of a citizenship that is "good citizenship" in the truest sense of the expression; the necessity in the lives of all for wholesome sport, the duties of American parents, the all-important position of the home in the making of the United States, law and legislation, the spiritual well-being of the people generally and self-government—these are some of the subjects covered in this file of the "sayings" of President Hoover.

To print the file complete would require a volume. Therefore what follows is a selection of some of the more striking extracts of what Mr. Hoover has said since he came into world-wide prominence fifteen years ago. All of the paragraphs, each of which may be regarded as a separate quotation, are from the "Hoover file" in the Department of the Interior. They are given under several classifications:

National Problems.

The first step in competent handling of any problem is to determine the facts. Facts are only to be found by searching and capable investigation.

If we are able to find the solution to our many problems, it will be in our ability to command an enlarged vision of neighborly relations by stretching them over the nation as a whole.

The first requisite for the solution of these great problems of ours is accurate knowledge.

Citizenship.

Good citizenship begins at home within the family circle, for the family is the most basic and important social unit. It includes neighborliness and high regard for the rights and welfare of others in all business dealings and personal contact.

The citizens of each nation should be mindful of the rights and feelings of those of other nations, and each should desire to have his country act fairly in all its dealings with other foreign countries.

Our country will require in enlarging proportion, citizens who not only are good fathers and mothers, and good neighbors, but who keep themselves well informed on various problems connected with local, state and national governments.

The next generation will be called on to show public-spirited citizenship to an increasing degree if it is to find a solution of the problems that await it. * * * If good citizenship in the broadest sense of the term is to be the deciding factor, and I believe that it will be, we must make it as vital a matter as earning our daily bread.

Good citizenship involves right adjustment on the part of the individual to his human environment.

Character is the real metal of our national life. It is the nation's greatest asset, an individual's greatest asset. The chief factor in character-making is environment. And its first environment is home life.

Self Government.

Self-government comprises more than political institutions. It is more than municipal governments, and State governments, Legislatures and commissions. No doubt real self-government starts in every individual, that he control his own moral and intellectual contacts with his fellow-men in common interest.

Laws and Legislation.

These complex problems cannot be solved by any ironclad system of governmental action. Much can be done by the waking of public conscience in every community. Much still remains to be carried out by action from the State in its local as well as national phases.

I am one of those who believes that the standards established by the community itself from a sense of its responsibility are infinitely more valuable than standards established by the imposition of authority from above.

National character cannot be built by law. It is the sum of the moral fibre of its individuals.

Public Health.

Our new field is the systematic determination of the shortcomings in the health protection, community by community, and the demonstration of remedy. We do not propose to be either scolds or preachers. Our aim is rather the scientific determination of the defects in community life, the suggestion of remedies and the enlistment of all the voluntary and official forces in the communities to their solution.

In public health the discoveries of science have opened a new era. Many sections of our country and many groups of our citizens suffer from diseases, the eradication of which are mere matters of administration and moderate expenditure.

Public health service should be as fully organized and as universally incorporated into our governmental system as is public education. The returns are a thousandfold in economic benefits and infinitely more in the reduction of suffering and promotion of human happiness.

It should be our purpose to develop to the maximum of responsibility all local and State resources which can contribute to the health of mothers and children.

The local community is the unit of responsibility in American public life. The sum of progress in the local communities is the sum of national progress. When this progress springs from the community itself we have not only progress in the protection of child life but the reinforcement of the foundations upon which our society must rest.

I believe that the definite institution of supplementary child feeding in public schools in certain places is a necessary part of municipal endeavor. Coupled also with this, I am a firm believer in clinical examination and reports to parents as a definite part of school work.

The movement to foster public parks for human outdoor life and conservation of wild life is one of our most beneficent public endeavors.

Every one has his particular brand of joy ready for national adoption. My own notions lie toward providing larger opportunity than hitherto to return to primitive life in the mountains, woods and streams.

Health and Well Being.

There is a very close and vital connection between human happiness, mental and spiritual advancement and material well-being.

From health in the physical sense we have arrived at the ideal of health as wholeness, signifying the development of the child in his complete endowment—physical, mental, emotional and spiritual.

The strong man must at all times be alert to the attack of insidious disease.

Human Qualities.

If we would solve our economic problems it will be through the upbuilding of the great homespun qualities of friendship, honesty, charity, industry, courage, sobriety, modesty, loyalty and tolerance.

There is a very close and vital connection between human happiness, mental and spiritual advancement, and material well-being.

We have not lost the dominance of the old-fashioned virtues of honesty, of neighborly service, of life of family and home, of faith in God, or the purposes of our country.

Good community action must be based upon full realization of sound and practical measures. Idealism in these problems of social progress msut have its root in ruthless realism and in scientific research.

The great danger of the world today is that our spiritual advancement shall lag behind our material improvements.

The only safeguard we have against the malign forces that come with these great gifts to man is to build up the moral and spiritual forces of the world and to crystallize them into continuing institutions.

We can give to the succeeding generation a vast equipment in plant and machinery, a great store of knowledge of how to run it, and we can leave for their stimulation centuries of art and literature. But the world will march forward only so far as we give to our children strength of body, integrity of character, training of mind and the inspiration of religion.

We are concerned for the patriotic growth of the moral and spiritual unity of our nation in the confidence that we shall thereby make our best contribution to civilization.

Children.

The necessity to circumvent negative conditions in the lives of children is as great as it ever has been, but there is a call to establish positive standards of wholesome living and to bring into evidence maximum possibilities of development.

In the early days of child welfare propaganda much of the information given out was taken on faith. That day has passed. We have learned the necessity of testing theories by experiment as well as by experience.

The wisest move in the conservation of child life at the present moment seems to be to develop technique and machinery to translate scientific data into human terms.

Our most precious national asset—our children.

The tie between the child and all adult life is at once the strongest and gentlest element in human nature.

The natural tendency of most healthy things is to grow.

Life goes the way youth finally takes.

The race moves forward upon the health of children.

Children have certain rights that should be emblazoned as high as the rights of men. There is no such thing as equality of opportunity or the pursuit of happiness or any other of the great catalogue of human rights, that are effective for children who are not fully up to normal.

Every State in the Union requires that automobiles be registered; it would seem that babies might have at least equal consideration.

The Normal Child.

Standards are wanted, but not standardized children. The ideal child is the optimal child when all factors are balanced. These factors may be different for different children. We want them different, because the greater the varieties of good combinations, the richer will be the range of types, the greater will be the contributions made to our national life.

It seems an arraignment of our civilization that with all our scientific endeavor and our beneficent intentions we come to this day with no concrete standards to tell us what is a healthy child, what is normality in human beings. Interest and zeal have crystallized to the point where science will shortly have to answer the question: "What is a normal child?" and then, "What is a perfect child?"

Our chief aim must be to give the normal child an opportunity to go through to manhood and womanhood in the full flush of natural vigor.

1. Mothers to possess up-to-date knowledge of child-bearing and child care.
2. Children to be examined at frequent intervals to detect physical and mental handicaps early enough to permit correction.
3. Parents and teachers taught the ways of child health.
4. Provision for safe food and drink in such variety and proportion as to supply a balanced diet.
5. Living quarters improved.
6. Recreation facilities furnished.
7. Communities aroused to the need and importance of child health education.

Just as the modern science of floriculture aims to produce the widest possible variety of beautiful types, so the science of health development of children should aim to free them from hampering impediments to anything that would enable each child to blossom into the infinite variety which is characteristic of life.

That part of malnutrition due to ignorance on the part of the parents would in time find ultimate solution if all our schools elaborated their curricula, on the hygiene side, up to standards set in a few localities, for at least we would catch up with the next generation.

Child Labor.

Such a practice results in the progressive degeneration of the race and tends to impair the human resources of the country on which the coming generation must rely.

We must not only protect our children from the physical degeneration of child labor but we must enable them by education to take their place in society and give them that equality of opportunity at their first step in life that should mark the particular distinction of our democracy.

Our work is racial defense. If we want civilization to march forward toward higher economic standards, to moral and spiritual ideals, it will march only on the feet of healthy children.

Schools.

But after all, our schools do more than merely transmit knowledge or training; they are America itself in miniature, where, in a purer air under wise guidance a whole life of citizenship is levied experimentally with its social contacts, its recreation, its ethical problems, its political practice, its duties and its rewards. Ideals are developed that shape the whole of adult life. Experience is gained that is valuable for all the years of maturity.

Milk.

There is another service which the organized community owes to infancy and childhood as well—that is the provision and protection of milk supplies. We need insistent recognition of the fact of the interdependence of the human animal upon his cattle. The white race cannot survive without its dairy products and no child can be developed on short or bad milk supplies.

The feeding of these masses of undernourished children [by the American Relief Administration dealing with famine in Europe] demonstrated from the outset that there was no substitute for milk and that while a wide range of alternatives existed among other food-stuffs, yet this particular commodity was essential for their restoration to health and their maintenance.

Despite the increase in consumption of milk in the United States, I believe that any analyses of the subject will indicate that we are as yet far below that intake of dairy product which will obtain the maximum results in the health and development of our children.

There is no substitute for milk. We as a nation ought to consume about twice as much milk for children as we do.

We do not feed our children enough milk. The children of the white race for hundreds of generations have been dependent upon their cattle. They must have milk, good milk and plenty of milk.

Parents.

Our ideal is not only a child free from disease, it is also a child made free to develop to the utmost his capacity for physical, social and mental health. This means liberty to grow, the modern idea of education.

It is all well enough to state and restate the safeguards which the community should have, to talk of the evident deficiencies in childhood. But there are millions of parents who are doing everything they know, and they are asking the question daily: Have I succeeded? Does my child conform to the ideal of the normal?

If we could grapple with the whole child situation for one generation, our public health, our economic efficiency, the moral character, sanity and stability of our people would advance three generations in one.

The Home.

If we were to take a broad survey of the children of our nation, we could say at once that probably 60 per cent of them are from the homes of high intelligence and education; that the high character of their parents, with facilities furnished by the State in our public school system, need give us but little anxiety as to this great majority. It is upon the reduction of the remaining 40 per cent that our solicitude must concentrate itself.

Nothing makes more for security and advancement than devotion to the upbuilding of home life.

The real character and progress of a nation should not be gauged by its progress in industry, commerce, finance and science alone. The development of its homes must keep progress with material progress.

We must keep in mind not houses only, but homes. There is a vital distinction.

The family is the unit of civilization. Its gathering point and shelter is the home.

Good homes are the right of all citizens, not merely the privilege of the well-to-do.

The family and its home is the rock on which civilization has its foundations. It is the background of all our spiritual, our social and economic life.

Home making, home pride and home happiness are the beginnings of all progress.

The home is the place in which moral and spiritual forces must find their roots, and from safeguarding the home must spring that contentment and happiness that we are so earnestly seeking.

The right kind of home life makes for true success in life, and means progress for the nation as a whole.

The home is fundamental because it is the mold in which the character of the next generation is formed.

In the restless, shifting currents of our modern life we are sometimes at a loss for ideals and standards to help us keep our bearings. But a higher and finer type of home life is one ideal to which we can well hold fast.

The home is the concern of all, and every one should welcome the opportunity to contribute to its welfare.

Environment.

It is not the purpose of these efforts to invade or relieve the responsibility of parents, but to advance those activities in care and protection of children which are beyond the control of the individual parent.

It is no use going on making more leisure if we are going to use it for moral and physical degeneration—destructive joy.

Since conditioned environment is essentially the basic feature of our best modern education program, the conditioning of the child's environment from babyhood to adolescence, with respect to food, clothing, housing, fresh air, baths, exercise and rest, must be considered his elementary rights. But the development of standards with respect to these things in relation to the child's health should be by the best scientific and educational authorities.

Modern Conditions of Living.

A century of scientific discoveries has brought us fabulous contributions to comfort and happiness, but these discoveries have come with such accelerated pace that we have at times not been able to find solutions for the thousands of problems which follow in their path.

The days of the pioneer are not over. There are continents of science in which we have penetrated but the coastal plain.

Sports.

Contest and sport in themselves contain stimulation to spirit and to elevation of character. For the essence of sportsmanship is to prepare one's self through self-denial and industry to long sustained effort; to ignore the mean and unfair things to do the fair and generous thing.

I am for more fishing for fun as a contribution to constructive joy, because it gives an excuse and an impulse to take to the woods and water.

The joyous rush of streams and breakers is a fine antidote for those of us who take our part in dull routine.

There is equality in all men before fishes. The fish has never learned to discriminate much in the price of tackle. He takes no account of clothes or manners. And with it all, while there are moments of excitement, the good fisherman must yield to contemplative moods, for often it is a long time between bites.

AN EFFORT TO MAKE NEW YORK CLEANER

Sanitation Commission Tackles Whole Problem of Sewage, Garbage, Streets

By VIRGINIA POPE.

NEW YORK'S sanitation commission has begun its great task of devising a modern system of sewage and garbage disposal for the metropolis and, further, of devising better methods of keeping the streets clean. Dr. William Schroeder Jr., head of the commission, is confident that in time its aims will be accomplished although he recognizes the difficulties that must be met and overcome.

A few days ago Dr. Schroeder announced his plan for modernizing the street cleaning service at a cost to the city of $35,000,000, the larger part of that amount to be spent for incinerators and garages. His investigations led him to the conclusion that 1,000 additional men will be needed to keep the streets adequately clean. There are now 11,000 men on the force and 1,900 pieces of street cleaning apparatus. Dr. Schroeder's inventory showed that 760 pieces of apparatus are useless and that 190 of the others need repairing to bring them up to standard.

Properly to outfit the Street Cleaning Department, now incorporated in the Sanitation Commission, Dr. Schroeder estimates that 500 new trucks at an average cost of $500 each will be required. He will not ask for funds to defray the entire bill at once, but will seek an initial appropriation at the next meeting of the Board of Estimate. The commissioner proposes, moreover, to appeal to public pride in keeping the city clean. To this end he will organize an educational campaign through welfare and social agencies. Mrs. Constance Warren, widow of the late Police Commissioner Joseph V. Warren, has been appointed assistant secretary to the commission to take charge of the educational work.

Dr. Schroeder is the first to hold the post of Commissioner of Sanitation, to which he was appointed in November by Mayor Walker. The establishment of the commission was authorized at the election on Nov. 5, when the people of New York voted in favor of a unified system for the city, including street cleaning, garbage disposal, and the construction of sewage disposal plants and intercepting sewers to care for the waste of the five boroughs. Previously each borough had been responsible for its own sewage and garbage disposal, and Queens and Richmond looked after their own street cleaning, the other three boroughs having a common headquarters organization.

Neglected Problems.

Such problems as harbor pollution were slighted under the old system, for the duties and prerogatives of the various borough authorities did not overlap sufficiently to permit of a comprehensive unified attack. It is believed that when the present centralized department gets under way greater efficiency will be achieved.

The new law called for the appointment of three commissioners—a physician familiar with the problems of public health, an engineer and a layman. Thus far only the first two have been appointed: Dr. Schroeder and L. C. H. Smith, an engineer. When the third member is appointed he will serve "as a balance wheel for us professionals," to quote Dr. Schroeder, who will act as chairman.

The biggest problem that the Department of Sanitation has to face, according to Dr. Schroeder, is that of sewage disposal. "Today we are dealing with antiquated machinery in no way fitted to cope with the tremendous population of present-day New York," he said recently. "Take for instance this lower section of Manhattan. When the plants were built that serve it no one dreamed of the tremendous congestion we have here now. What the city needs is a unified plan, with intercepting sewers that will hook up into an adequate disposal system.

"Our first duty is to begin with the Ward's Island development. It is just a question of days until we will be able to go forward with that project, for which the plans have been completed. It is to be an activated sludge plant of the latest type, and is designed to care for the upper Eastern portion of Manhattan and the southern section of the Bronx, a population of approximately 1,100,000. It will anticipate the expansion of that section by 500,000 more persons in the next ten years. But even that accounts for only one-sixth of the population of greater New York. To be sure, it will reduce the pollution of the Harlem and the upper East Rivers, but it will have relatively little effect on the pollution of the harbor.

Protecting Public Health.

"Now we know," continued Dr. Schroeder, "because it has been scientifically proven, that in an activated sludge plant 90 per cent of all bacteria is removed. It is an absolutely safe proposition. Ought not New York City to offer its residents at least this guarantee of health? We are going to need other plants to care for lower and western Manhattan, Brooklyn and Queens, to say nothing of Richmond. Just how and where the plants can be built I am not as yet prepared to say. But, since the cost of real estate is so high, and continuously mounting, why not consider the use of another of the numerous small islands? Some years ago a proposition was made to build an island in the sea to care for a sewage disposal plant—an impractical and costly affair. Why not use what is ready and at hand?

"To get down to the matter of dollars and cents. The Ward's Island plant will in itself cost the city $18,000,000, while the intercepting sewers in Manhattan and the Bronx are estimated at $12,000,000. This makes $30,000,000 to take care of 1,100,000 persons. Suppose we multiply it by 6; that will give us $180,000,000. It may sound a large figure, but it would be cheap at the price for the health of a great city like New York.

"A large portion of the city's garbage is now dumped into the sea," continued Dr. Schroeder, recalling that approximately 500,000 tons of garbage and 750,000 tons of ashes are towed out to sea in barges and dumped every year. "Our present equipment cannot meet our needs. Manhattan has 4 incinerators, Brooklyn 3, Richmond 5, Queens 9 and the Bronx none. I have asked for more—Five for Manhattan, 4 for the Bronx, 5 for Queens, 5 for Brooklyn and 2 for Richmond. The estimated cost of them is $28,630,000."

Commissioner Schroeder, turning his attention to the third and by no means least important function of his department, street cleaning, said that he had inspected all parts of the city.

"The conditions have been pretty bad, but they are going to be better. We must have clean streets" said the commissioner. "For one thing we are going to have covered wagons. There is now an appropriation for sixty-five or seventy of the old type, but we are not going to get them. If the allowance will only permit the purchase of forty or fifty of the new type, that is all we are going to get until we have more money. What is the use of continuing in bad ways? Think of the harm that is done by letting ashes and other rubbish collected blow or spill off, spreading dirt and the germs of disease."

BUSINESS ARBITRATION OPEN TO ALL SECTIONS

Through the National Panel, Disputes Anywhere May Be Settled Out of Court, Following the Procedure That Has Proved of Great Value in the East

THE annual report of the American Arbitration Association for 1929 reveals the practical completion of a national system of arbitration whereby a business dispute in any part of the United States may now be settled without recourse to the courts—by arbitration. Lucius R. Eastman is president of the association, whose headquarters are at 521 Fifth Avenue, and Felix M. Warburg is chairman of the board.

"We have applied the chain-store idea to arbitration," said Mr. Eastman. "You see, you cannot set up an arbitration tribunal after a dispute has started. There is no time. The machinery for arbitration must be set up beforehand. Many national organizations have central offices in New York where there is that machinery, but they may have fifty different offices scattered over the country, and an arbitration clause in their contracts would be meaningless if there were no method of submitting differences that might arise in those places to an arbitrator."

That difficulty has now been overcome. A national panel of arbitrators has been established through the appointment of 7,000 men located in 1,730 cities and towns covering every State in the Union. The association believes that the willingness of these men to serve without compensation and the appreciation of arbitration that has been expressed by them are convincing proof that while the sentiment for arbitration in the United States appears to be overwhelming, practical organization is necessary.

Selection of Arbitrators.

"We wrote to the chambers of commerce or the secretaries of the civic associations or the bankers in each place asking them to recommend ten or fifteen men as arbitrators," said Mr. Eastman. "We sent them a guide explaining the purpose and the principles of arbitration and the duties of the arbitrator. Then we wrote to the men selected, formally inviting them to become arbitrators, with full details of the arbitration system, and made up our national panel from the 7,000 leading citizens of those communities—bankers, merchants, manufacturers, lawyers and other business and professional men who accepted."

At its headquarters in New York the association maintains three permanent tribunals, and additional facilities are available when required.

One of the great advantages of the establishment of this national system, Mr. Eastman pointed out, is that it makes available a uniform procedure for settling commercial disputes throughout the country, while State laws vary. The system is open to any one who in his contracts uses an arbitration clause providing that any dispute arising in connection with it shall be submitted to arbitration under the rules of the American Arbitration Association.

The association has issued a standard arbitration clause which it furnishes without charge. More than 30,000 of these have been distributed to firms and corporations throughout the country. The clause may be used by a merchant without becoming a member of the association or even obtaining its permission. It is valid, irrevocable and enforceable under the laws of ten States at the present time—New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Louisiana, California, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island and Arizona, which have comprehensive arbitration laws—and under the Federal arbitration law in disputes arising out of interstate and maritime transactions.

In its efforts to spread the arbitration principle throughout the United States, the association began by concentrating on the passage of a uniform arbitration law in accord with the Federal arbitration law in the seaboard States. Now, such a bill is pending in the Virginia Legislature, and is about to be introduced in several additional States, including Kentucky, South Carolina and Mississippi. It is hoped to extend the law throughout the country eventually, so that the national panel may be still further supported in its work.

But this does not mean that arbitration is not at the present time effective in States that have no arbitration law, Mr. Eastman pointed out. In the first place, there is the Federal arbitration law covering the country. In the second place there is the fact that organizations having several offices may provide in their contracts that arbitration is enforceable under the laws of one of the States that already have such acts.

"If one of the parties to a dispute, who lives in a State having no arbitration law, tries to take it to court after the other party, who lives in a State that has such a law, has submitted it to arbitration," Mr. Eastman said, "the court will usually prevent the suit from starting, and stand by the arbitrator's decision."

The association's policy is always to seek the cooperation of the judiciary and the bar, and, paradoxically enough, a considerable part of their work is furnishing information to lawyers who recommend arbitration to their clients.

Trade associations participate in this national system of arbitration by cooperating with the American Arbitration Association, and among the organizations using the facilities of the association are the Wool Institute, covering the entire industry; American Bottlers of Carbonated Beverages, having branches in every State; Actors' Equity Association, American Fur Merchants Association, Authors' League of America, Jute and Gunnies Importers Association, National Association of Purchasing Agents, National Retail Dry Goods Association, and many other trade associations and chambers of commerce.

Method of Procedure.

How does an arbitration case actually work? What is the specific procedure? The publications supplied by the association answer those questions fully, giving the whole method of conducting arbitration in each locality from first to last, as well as the specific laws covering it. Say a man named Davenport and a man named Ferguson fall out over something covered by a contract that includes an arbitration clause. One or the other—or both—communicates with the association, stating the cause. The association then sends them lists of qualified arbitrators from the new national panel. It is the policy of the association to choose men for those lists who are familiar with the business under discussion and who command respect as unbiased arbitrators.

From those lists Davenport and Ferguson may agree on a single arbitrator, or they may each choose one from the identical lists, and then ask the association for another list from which to choose a third. This is not necessary, usually, because the whole point in choosing an arbitrator is to get a man who is impartial, who has no personal, family or financial relations with either party, and who has, in short, no purpose except to help settle the question with justice to both Davenport and Ferguson.

When the arbitrator has been chosen, certain forms are filled out giving the grounds of the controversy, the rules under which it is to be conducted, and an agreement to abide by the arbitrator's decision.

The arbitrator is now in full charge. He has to see that the preliminary papers are submitted properly and then he sets a meeting place—usually some neutral office—where he can hear what the row is all about. In case either party decides he wants to be represented by counsel he notifies the other in plenty of time so that he can fortify himself with a lawyer, too. But that is not often necessary.

The hearings begin. Davenport, who is the complaining party, is heard first, with his witnesses, if any. Then Ferguson and his witnesses take the floor. And, as the rules state, "each party shall have full opportunity to establish his claim and no restriction shall be placed upon either party which might tend to prejudice his interests," but, "the arbitrators may reject any and all evidence which they consider immaterial or irrelevant."

Graduated Fees Charged.

There are certain fees to be paid. When the submission of the case is made by the two parties, Davenport and Ferguson each pay one of the following sums, according to the amount of the claim: Up to $1,000, $10 each; from $1,000 to $10,000, $25 each; and more than $10,000, $100 each. For each additional hearing that it takes to get the difficulty straightened out an additional sum equal to one-half of the fee paid for the first hearing is paid by each party. The rules say that from this fund the arbitrators shall pay the incidental expenses actually incurred in the hearing.

The arbitrator is required to make his award within twenty business days after the conclusion of the hearing—unless Davenport and Ferguson agree to extend the time. Otherwise the office of arbitrator automatically becomes vacant. The arbitrator does not have to do more than set forth his decision in definite and final terms. But if he wants to he may include the reasons for the decision he has made. He simply notifies the two parties by registered mail and, if the law requires it, he sends a copy to the court having authority to confirm, modify or vacate the award.

An award made by a majority of arbitrators—where there are several—is, of course, binding unless otherwise provided by law, or unless the parties stipulate beforehand that it must be unanimous. All the original documents and papers available, except those submitted as evidence, are usually filed for future reference with the association.

The rules of the association contain no provisions for an appeal on the merits of an award, but, of course, parties may make specific provisions for appeal—say, from one arbitrator to another—beforehand. But the whole value of the principle of arbitration rests on the belief that it provides a thoroughly just method for the prompt settlement of business disputes in complete good faith.

In establishing the new national panel the association believes that the actual number of controversies which these tribunals may determine is of less value than the fact that in each town or city of commercial importance there should be men available for such public service in the maintenance of commercial peace.

WORK OF THE FUR INDUSTRY TO BE EXHIBITED IN GERMANY

AN exposition embracing every phase of the fur industry, from the hunting of fur-bearing animals to the display of the latest fashions, will be held this year at Leipzig. The leading fur producing countries, including the United States, will send exhibits and the great zoological gardens of Europe will lend fur-bearing animals, which will be shown in their native habitats. A hunting exposition and an international congress of the fur industry will be held in connection with the exposition.

An entire village will be brought from China and rebuilt about an artificial lake, and in this setting the native methods of gathering and treating furs will be shown. A tenth century Russian caravan for transporting furs will be reproduced with an old trading post. An Eskimo village will also be brought from the Far North and reconstructed in a setting of artificial snow and ice.

The German Government has invited the fur-producing countries to send representatives to the Internation Fur Congress, which will be held from the end of May until the last of September.

One feature of the exposition will be a furriers' hall of honor, which will contain a series of historical exhibits contributed by guilds and museums. There will be workshops in operation, also model dressing and drying plants, and displays of the latest styles in furs.

SOUTH AFRICAN FLORA PRESENT YEARLY CYCLE OF GREAT BEAUTY

THE native land of General Jan Christiaan Smuts unfolds a cycle of floral beauty as the year rolls around. The flowers of late Summer and early Autumn are now at their best. In the early Summer months of October and November, Pretoria, the administrative capital of the Union of South Africa, literally wears a mantle of mauve.

In recent years the avenues of the capital have been planned with jacaranda, a tree of Brazilian origin, and "jacaranda time" has come to have the significance of cherry blossom time in Washington. The trees are prolific bloomers with petals that fall as they mature, carpeting the streets in purple. In Summer the streets of Pretoria are gay with visitors from other parts of South Africa and from the British Isles.

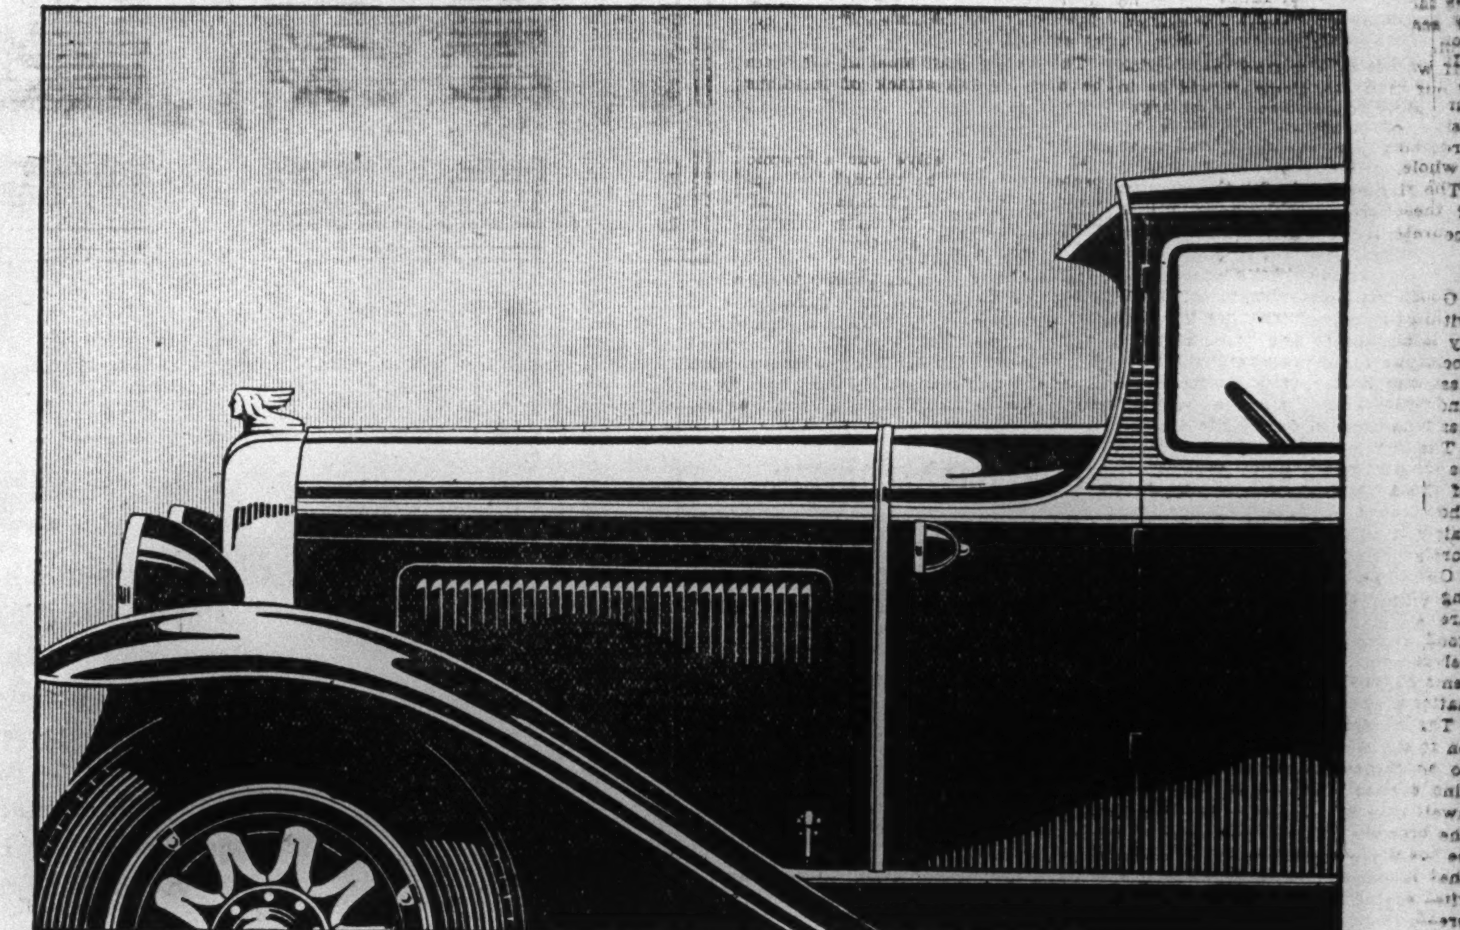
With the first rainfalls of Spring the floral awakening begins throughout the dominion. Oxalis of many species and colors—pink, yellow, salmon, white and crimson—cover vast acres. Fields of the heaths and white heather can be followed for miles. Aleos, red and orange-colored lilies, lend vivid splashes of color to the landscape. Many other varieties of bulbous plants bloom with the maturing of Spring into Summer.

Travelers from Europe in early days were enthusiastic about the gorgeous flowers of South Africa, of which more than 2,000 varieties have been catalogued, and carried specimens home.

The South African Wild Flower Protection Society is working through protective measures of legislation and education to preserve rare species of flowers, some of which are threatened with extinction. The propagating of these species is being carried on by scientific methods in the South African National Botanic Gardens at Kirstenbosch, near Cape Town.

A FAMOUS NAME ^^ A FINER CAR

a better buy than ever ^^^



Today the dollars which go to purchase a Pontiac have an increased buying power. The New Series Pontiac Big Six has made this possible. With its new beauty, smoother performance, greater safety and handling ease, it represents an improvement even over the cars which have borne its famous name in the past.

A Famous Name—Pontiacs of the past have been known for the many big car qualities which they combine with small car economy. Their big car speed, power and pick-up have won them widespread favor. Their big car long life and reliability have been a constant source of pride and satisfaction to their owners. And their economy has been threefold—for Pontiac owners have saved money when they bought, as they drive, and when they traded in their cars.

A Finer Car—The New Series Pontiac Big Six inherits all of those desirable qualities and introduces a number of improvements and refinements. The new Pontiac is more beautiful with its new, smartly styled bodies by Fisher. The smoothness of its 60-horsepower engine is increased by improved rubber mountings. An improved system of non-squeak four-wheel brakes, and a new sloping nonglare windshield add to Pontiac's safety. Greater handling ease has been brought about by the use of a newly designed worm-and-sector steering mechanism.

A Better "Buy" than Ever—Because it retains all of Pontiac's time-tried qualities and incorporates many notable advancements, the New Series Pontiac Big Six represents a better "buy" than its noted predecessors. To appreciate fully how much this new Pontiac offers for the money, you must see and drive it. BREAKWATER PLAN OFFERED NEW YORK

Adding a Great Expanse of Protected Water, Many Miles of Docking Space and a New Summer Resort Offered by Ernest Flagg

LOOKING ahead to the time when a great addition to New York City will grow on Staten Island at a rate far more rapid than that which characterized the development of the Bronx or Queens, Ernest Flagg, architect, has evolved a plan which would add about fifty miles of dockage to the port of New York and at the same time create a new recreation resort. And all of this, he contends, at an eventual and continuing profit to the city.

Briefly, Mr. Flagg's plan involves the construction of a breakwater at the entrance to the lower bay, connected by subway with existing transit systems in Brooklyn and with Manhattan by means of another subway under the upper bay to St. George, S. I.

The breakwater, which is the main feature of the plan, would be about two and a half miles long between Sandy Hook and Rockaway, as indicated in the accompanying drawing. There would be a 2,000-foot opening for the Ambrose Channel and other openings at each end to allow for the movement of tides, the mean range of which at that point is about 4.5 feet.

Beaches on the Breakwaters.

It is proposed that the breakwater take the form of two islands with beaches facing the open sea. The construction would be of riprap and concrete and, according to Mr. Flagg, the width would be limited only by the commercial requirements. At any rate, the islands would be sufficiently broad to provide building sites for hotels and the usual resort features in addition to a wide stretch of beach on the ocean side and yacht basins, excursion boat piers and seaplane landing facilities on the landward side.

Construction of the islands would, says Mr. Flagg, cost comparatively little. With the exception of a mean low water depth of forty feet in the Ambrose Channel, the water at that point is very shallow. Rock for foundations and masonry would be obtained from subway excavations and sand for the beach, which would be held within retaining walls of masonry, would be obtained by deepening and extending existing ship channels within the port. It is Mr. Flagg's idea that the cost of this part of his scheme would be more than covered by rentals for ground space. It is possible also that the project might be financed privately.

At any rate, the breakwater would serve a utilitarian purpose aside from its resort possibilities. Mr. Flagg says it would furnish the necessary protection for almost unlimited port facilities with all the advantages which have made the port of New York pre-eminent, but in far greater measure. With some dredging of existing channels, according to the plan, ships of any size could proceed direct to piers of any length without interference from the swift currents which make docking so difficult in the rivers.

In fact, it is Mr. Flagg's idea that with the completion of these facilities Manhattan would in time be relegated to second place. As he sees it, Manhattan is now congested almost to the saturation point, its plan is archaic and it labors under physical difficulties which cannot be remedied.

"A new and modern city," he says "should develop about the better facilities. The city would have a port commensurate both in extent and quality with all possible future needs and, unless guided by gross lack of forethought, a plan suited to modern conditions, having streets so arranged that different classes of traffic could move at different levels without interference or danger and the high parts of buildings sufficiently isolated to insure abundant light and air about them."

Of course, an essential part of the plan involves means for quick and direct communication between all parts of the city. The first link would be an extension of the subway from the Battery to St. George. This could be built to accommodate both freight and passengers, with branches to serve all parts of Staten Island. The construction, Mr. Flagg believes, would place no increased financial burden upon the city as a whole, because taxation on resulting increased land values on Staten Island would more than offset interest and sinking fund charges.

Port of Staten Island.

So far as shipping facilities are concerned, Mr. Flagg points out that Staten Island now has rail connections with the South and West over the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. A subway extension from Brooklyn would furnish an outlet to New England and other points over the Pennsylvania and the New York, New Haven & Hartford lines,

Although he has made no estimate of the cost, Mr. Flagg points out that with the exception of the breakwater, which he believes would be less than it is proposed to spend on the Jamaica Bay project, the development would be progressive and all charges could be met practically as they occurred through returns from concessions and dock leases by means of increased taxes on the property benefited.

As he sees it, the Jamaica Bay project could be completed and would be valuable, but there could be no comparison of results between the two plans.

"The Jamaica Bay project," he says, "would create a small adjunct to the present harbor, while the other would create a harber itself of such proportions and facilities that the present one could hardly be regarded as more than an adjunct to it—a harbor having natural advantages of location and physical qualities to render it second to no other, not only at present but far into the future. With this work completed there need be no fear as to this city's continued supremacy."

"PERFECT" BRIDGE HANDS ARE CALLED A BIT TOO NUMEROUS

THE perfect bridge hand containing thirteen cards of one suit, although reported to have occurred five times in the United States during the year 1929, is virtually a mathematical impossibility, according to Professor Theodore W. Gibson, bridge expert, and head of the department of mathematics at Long Island University, Brooklyn.

If the perfect thirteen-hand had occurred in good faith as frequently as reported in 1929, every man, woman and child in the United States would have had to play bridge four nights each week, he avows.

"Although bridge is popular," says Professor Gibson, "it is manifestly absurd to think that the United States ran any such average. Moreover, the perfect no-trump hand A-K-Q; A-K-Q; A; A-K-Q-J-10-9 should have arrived fifty times as often as the thirteen-of-a-suit, yet fewer were reported."

Professor Gibson, who is the originator of mathematical bridge systems, says that the chance of a hand containing thirteen cards of one suit is approximately one in 40,000,000,000 on any one deal. This figure is the theoretical one. Actually the chance is a great deal less, taking into account the fact that, at the end of a hand, the cards are gathered more or less in groups of four as a suit, as the tricks were turned, and that, although they are shuffled, the operation of shuffling is more or less perfunctory.

"I have investigated the mixing effects of the usual shuffle of several different persons and found that, in order for them to shuffle the cards so that a thirteen-hand would be dealt, an almost impossible arrangement would have had to exist at the beginning of the play. On the previous hand there would have had to be practically no cases where the players followed suit.

"A friend told me recently that whenever he wishes to break away from a bridge party he stacks the cards so that a thirteen-hand will be dealt. After that there is so much discussion that there is no more bridge. I wonder how many times some joker has arranged a thirteen hand, intending to confess later, only to find the story has been published and that he had better keep still?"

A SHOP RUN FOR CHARITIES SELLS WHAT FRIENDS GIVE

Its Offerings Include Dresses, Ornaments and Sometimes Even Upright Pianos

TOMORROW morning Everybody's Thrift Shop will open for business in its new quarters at 112 East Fifty-ninth Street. It did not have far to move, for the place it has occupied for the past nine years is next door. The new store is larger. On bright orange-colored shelves will be arranged a strangely assorted stock. Evening frocks, some having originated in Paris will hang on display. Rows upon rows of shoes—walking shoes, evening slippers and mules—will be conveniently placed for all to see and to try on. The prices come within the range of nearly every one's pocketbook.

Unlike other shops, the thrift shop does not have to buy its goods; everything placed on sale is donated. A busy housewife going through the family closets as she makes ready for a changing season pulls out this and that—her débutante daughter's ball gown or sport dress, her husband's business suit or bathrobe and her own former "best hat" and street dress—and decides to send them to Everybody's Thrift Shop.

Not only does the generous housewife send wearing apparel, but furniture, bric-à-brac and sometimes even a kitchen stove. The thrift shop is a philanthropy that works two ways; it offers the well-to-do a place to get rid of superfluous possessions, and makes them accessible to others at a low price. There are always enough buyers, say the shop authorities, but there is never enough stock. Yet the odd collection of goods serves a large and varied public—young girls who cannot afford to buy their "best" dress in a smart shop; actresses and movie stars who may find suitable costumes. There is a dressing room fitted up with a long mirror where they can survey themselves in their newly acquired finery.

The shop has a department for men. Occasionally stewards from ships lying for a day or two in the harbor find their way to the salesroom and buy shirts or shoes. Perhaps they even find a bit of fancy jewelry to take home. Every day one or two art collectors come in to see what quaint treasure has been discarded after an old-fashioned house has been remodeled.

There are always to be seen a few bisque groups of the kind that belonged to the ante-macassar era. Generally they are in the company of blue and red opaque glass vases, or an old-fashioned lamp. Once in a while a van will draw up to the shop door and deposit an old upright piano. The variety of the stock is infinite.

The income derived from the sales is divided among six charities—the Kips Bay Day Nursery, the Maternity Centre Association, the Woman's Auxiliary of the Union Settlement, the Bryson Day Nursery, the Association to Provide Proper Housing for Girls and the Vanderbilt Clinic Auxiliary. Many of the articles donated are received from members of these affiliated charities and the directors and friends of the shop. Volunteers from the boards of these organizations augment the sales staff. Every day some of them are present to help receive and put a price on the incoming stock. An approximate price has been set for all kinds of goods. Evening dresses can be had for from $10 to $25, books from 15 to 50 cents (there is always a need for fiction), and party slippers for a quarter.

Miss Mary K. Choate is the president of the organization, Mrs. Robert Bacon, first vice president, and Mrs. Anson B. Moran second vice president. Mrs. Wolcott G. Lane is treasurer, Mrs. David Dows, recording secretary, and Mrs. Thatcher M. Brown, corresponding secretary.

TRAFFIC GROWTH BRINGS NEED FOR BETTER ROADS

SINCE the inauguration of the Federal Aid highway system in 1921 automobile registrations in the United States have increased from 10,500,000 in 1921 to more than 25,000,000 registrations in 1929. Traffic over the country as a whole has become correspondingly congested.

Road improvements in various parts of the country have been greatly modified by so great an increase in traffic. Many of the desert and mountain roads crossing the sparsely settled States of Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado and Utah—roads growing in importance as cross continental highways—now require the type of highway improvements made in the more populous Eastern States ten years ago.

OLDSMOBILE offers IMPORTANT IMPROVEMENTS

- but not one change in fundamentals that made this car so popular - -

Oldsmobile announces improvements and refinements which add definitely to Oldsmobile's beauty, comfort, interior luxury, and increased driving satisfaction. The sum of these advancements is substantially increased value—an even finer car of low price.

In no case have changes been made for the sake of change alone. Every improvement serves a particular purpose—actually adds some desirable advantage to the car.

The bulk of the improvements are in the body. Refinements in body contours result in smarter style and longer, lower appearance. Interiors are roomier and more luxurious, with deeper seat cushions. Chassis refinements include improved, fully-enclosed four-wheel brakes; more responsive steering, and improved carburetion.

If you expect to buy a car this year, you owe it to yourself to see Oldsmobile—to drive it yourself—in order that you may make comparisons and form an accurate opinion of its value. You incur no obligation. Come in—soon.

A MAN'S "FINANCIAL AGE" AS MEASURED BY THRIFT

The American Provident Society Sets Up Standards by Which the Candidate for Independence in His Late Years May Judge of His Progress

THE determination of a man's "financ'al age" by estimating his reserves in cash or property is the feature of a new thrift plan announced by the American Provident Society, recently formed by leading educators, bankers and business men. The society has published a book entitled "How Old Am I Financially?" in which that question is answered by tables which indicate what reserves a man should have at any period in his life, and what he should be regularly saving. The organization aims to teach wise spending and saving and the avoidance of "get-rich-quick" schemes, and thus to reduce poverty and dependence in old age.

In spite of the emphasis upon the teaching of thrift in the United States and the fact that Americans receive the highest real wages in the world, many are dependent when they cease to earn. This is due to the fact that most thrift teaching relates to saving for a "rainy day" in an indefinite future instead of for the present, according to Charles DeForest, president of the society. As a consequence of such vagueness, it is said, the earner drifts along with little if any financial reserve until it is too late to save, and he becomes an object of charity at the hands of his children, other individuals or the State.

An earner 18 years old who has $100 that he holds as a reserve is doing well, says the society. If he has but $100 at 28 he has slipped behind; if $100 at 45, the situation is grave; if $100 at 65, it is pathetic. Clearly, one's financial worth is not measured by an integer of dollars but by a fraction in which the dollars owned are the numerator and the owner's age in years and his responsibilities the denominator. When a physical examination given to a man 45 years of age indicates that he is still 30 in health, he is to be congratulated; but when a man 45 years old is only 30 financially, he is to be pitied.

Three Orders of Reserve.

There is a specific money reserve that every one should have for each separate year and month of life after childhood, according to the society. The reserve tables as developed by the society are in three schedules, the minimum (in order to assure necessaries), the middling (in order to assure necessaries and comforts), and the master (in order to assure necessaries, comforts, luxuries and power). Under each a specific sum of money, or money value in insurance or property, is allotted to each year of life. There are also reserve tables for each year from birth to 18 in nominal amounts for educative purposes.

The schedules under each classification state the amounts to be saved monthly or weekly. The amounts are small at the start and increase each year except for a setback at the hypothetical time of marriage—until the presumed declining years of earning. The total amounts to be saved from one's own earnings are but one-third the total goals at age 65, compound interest accounting for the other two-thirds.

The junior reserve schedules call for a deposit of $5 at birth for all three classifications. Following the middling schedule, for example, $1 is added to this sum each year to age 7, when the child would have $13.74 (including interest). In the seventh year $1.50 is saved, this amount being gradually increased yearly to age 15, when $10.60 a year is saved and when the total deposits and interest amount to $62.09. By the eighteenth year the reserve is $100.30.

For age 18 the monthly deposits are put at $8; for 19, $10; for 20, $12; for 25, $9.50 (supposedly the "marriageable age"); and for 30, $16.50. At 30 years of age the person who has followed the middling schedule will have reserves of $2,482.07 on his birthday, the person who has followed the minimum plan will have $1,460.41, and the one who has kept to the master schedule, $4,525.83. Thirty-five years later the person who has kept to the minimum schedule will have $21,002, the "middling" depositor will have $35,001, and the "master" depositor, $75,000. There is also a "super-master" reserve schedule by which a person may have $100,000 at age 65.

Economic Criteria Offered.

The reserve schedules afford ready and practical answers to difficult economic questions of life, according to the society, for which no such definite criteria have been offered. For example, Can I afford to buy this thing? If I am below the minimum reserve for my present age, I had better stick to necessaries or things that increase my earning power until I have come up to the schedule. On the other hand, if one has a surplus above the master schedule, the society holds that he can rightly buy some sheer luxuries, by no means waiting.

The society's study does not lead to a sweeping condemnation of either instalment buying or speculation. Instead, it gives the individual a touchstone to determine whether he should practice them. Many a person who has only $200 unpledged feels that he is big enough to take chances, but the society holds that if one does not have the minimum reserve he had better stick to Class A investments.

If one has a surplus to his minimum reserve, let him try a Class B investment. If he has a surplus to his middling reserve, he is justified in seeking higher profits in Class C investments. If he has a surplus to his master reserve, he is the person to take chances in Class D investments, with a full understanding that he is risking a full loss in hopes of extraordinary gain.

The three reserves help to answer other interesting questions. One is, Can I afford to marry now? The society would advise a young woman whose suitor has nothing but prospects and not even the minimum reserve to tell him either to wait or depart.

Objects of the Society.

In particular, the objects of the American Provident Society, as set forth in the articles of incorporation, are (1) to encourage individual industry or initiative; (2) to discourage the desire to get "something for nothing" or to gain at the expense of others instead of through service; (3) to prevent waste; (4) to inculcate foresight; (5) to train the individual to follow a schedule of saving for each year of life, and to maintain a financial reserve suitable to his present age—not merely for the indefinite future; (6) to teach the protection of savings, and (7) to check speculation.

The society aims to encourage the buying of insurance, the ownership of homes, wise spending and the avoidance of parsimony, to induce parents to train their children to habits of thrift, and, through the recognition of Franklin's birthday on Jan. 17, to induce people to take financial examinations, testing their financial ages.

To accomplish these purposes the society will cooperate with banks, insurance companies and other conservative investment institutions, chambers of commerce, and educational, religious and philanthropic organizations. It is to disseminate educational publications and build up a popular membership. The society considers itself a social service institution, and is not organized for profit. It is backed by bankers and philanthropists, and money obtained through the sales of its book "How Old Am I Financially?" will go to its support.

"FINANCIAL AGE" OF MAN

THE American Provident Society, contending that a man should follow a definite scheme of saving for every month and year of his life in order to be financially independent at age 65, has worked out three schedules of "reserves" and deposits for persons of varying incomes. From these schedules, part of which are listed below, a man's "financial age" can be determined.

AGE.	MINIMUM.		MIDDLING.		MASTER.
	Monthly Savings.	Total Reserves.	Monthly Savings.	Total Reserves.	Monthly Savings.	Total Reserves.
20	$7.25	$ 185.57	$12.00	$ 328.34	$22.00	$ 607.85
25	5.50	826.01	9.50	1,400.60	16.50	2,607.74
30	10.00	1,460.41	16.50	2,482.07	26.75	4,525.83
35	13 50	2,557.06	21.50	4,271.36	39.00	7,632.84
40	14.75	4,042.65	24.00	6,714.09	49.00	12,281.00
45	17.50	5,958.23	26.50	9,948.54	56.50	18,820.00
50	18.75	8,580.13	29.00	14,184.00	63.00	27,712.00
55	18.25	11,824.00	28.00	19,672.00	67.50	39,582.00
60	17.50	15,966.00	23.50	26,610.00	68.00	55,318.00
65	.....	21,002.00	.....	35,001.00	.....	75,000.00

A person may become a member if he is at least 16 years old, and if he has during the last completed year of his life increased his savings in money by at least the amount required to be saved in that year by a person of his age according to the minimum reserve schedule, or who has total savings that he intends to keep as a permanent reserve equal in value at least to the total amount called for at his age; or who has increased his savings at interest in the past year by $100, or who has at least $1,000 saved.

Besides the president, Mr. DeForest, who is a brother of Lee DeForest, the inventor, and who has had broad experience in social service work, the officers of the society are: Dr. Roswell C. McCrea, vice president; Harry E. Morrow, treasurer; James F. Hoosic, secretary; and Ira L. Anderson, assistant secretary. Directors, in addition to the officers, are Philip A. Benson, Richard Edie Jr. and Paul Sturtevant.

ARTICHOKE SUGAR PROCESS TESTED

The Federal Bureau of Standards Points to the Possibility of an Industry Like That Based on the Sugar Beet

NEW YORK learned recently that it possesses an "Artichoke King." To the metropolitan resident, artichoke denotes the stiffly petalled aristocrat of the vegetable market. To the farmer the word stands for no more than a weed that hogs root up in the woods. The French artichoke is the idea of the one, the Jerusalem, of the other.

Hitherto the balance of public opinion has been altogether in favor of the French, but now it appears that even the Jerusalem is no longer to be despised. It has lately assumed such importance that the Natural Resources Intelligence Service of Canada, whence the species was introduced to a more appreciative Europe, has launched for it a "back home" movement. Dominion farmers are advised that they will make no mistake in cultivating the artichoke on an extensive scale.

This advice is based largely on the results of laboratory researches of the United States Bureau of Standards, pointing to the possibility of an artichoke sugar industry commensurate with that of which the sugar beet is the basis. The Jerusalem artichoke has long been known to be rich in levulose, a sugar of high solubility and brilliance, sweeter than cane sugar, and anti-diabetic. Some tubers have shown a yield of more than 17 per cent of this valuable product.

The problem facing the Bureau of Standards was the recovery of the levulose by a method that would prove commercially feasible. The reagents at first used were much too expensive; but in time experimentation found that levulose could be economically crystallized from a water solution, and the opinion was advanced that artichoke sugar could be produced at a cost no greater, and perhaps less, than that of sugar from beets.

These findings suggest limitless prospects, for the Jerusalem artichoke is capable of wide cultivation with less expenditure of time, labor and cash than almost any other crop. It is one of the few plants that, so far as experts have been able to learn, has mastered all or most of its enemies. It grows on most soils, poor as well as rich, provided they are not too wet. It adapts itself to a wide range of climate, withstanding both frost and drought far better than potatoes, beets and corn, and is little subject to disease, or with the exception of the grasshopper, to insect pests.

Once planted, Jerusalem artichokes multiply rapidly and are not easily eradicated. The plants require little cultivation; and at the end of the growing season may be left where they are until needed. The earth proves to be a perfect storehouse.

Comparatively little has been done with the Jerusalem artichoke in America, but in Europe it has been much used. Introduced into France in the seventeenth century it found its way thence into other countries. In England it acquired the name by which we know it. Botanists classed it with the sunflower.

In early times the only Jerusalem artichokes known were red or reddish brown on the outside. The white variety, now commonest, was not developed until the latter part of the nineteenth century. Ere this all Europe had grown to know it well. There it appears commonly on the table.

ENCLOSED RADIATORS FOUND TO OFFER HIGH EFFICIENCY

Tests at University, However, Indicate That the Type of Enclosure Is Important

WHETHER radiators are to be covered or not has long since resolved itself into a question merely of expense. If free radiator covers are optional with every dwelling unit, it is safe to say that no more iron ribs of heating apparatus would be in evidence. The cover is welcomed to shield ugliness. There are also other arguments in its favor. It protects draperies from dirt and turns the radiator into a piece of furniture—a table or a window seat.

Now still another good word comes for it from the engineering experiment station of the University of Illinois, where tests have proved, contrary to popular belief, that enclosed radiators may keep a room as comfortable with greater steam economy than may those left bare. The report adds, however, that there are many types of radiator covers, and that people interested in efficiency as well as in appearance should carefully choose the type they accept.

On the upper floor of the mechanical engineering laboratory of the university a testing plant was set up, consisting of two rooms, a little basement and a little attic with typical outside walls, windows and doors, and surrounded by an air space in which, by means of fans and refrigerating coils, given weather conditions may be created and maintained. There were instruments for observing and recording both air and surface temperatures without entering the rooms or disturbing the test conditions.

In each room was connected an ordinary six-section, twenty-six inch, five-tube cast iron radiator with a rated area of 21 square feet, and apparatus was set up for regulating the pressure of the steam in the units and weighing the condensation. Then the radiator in each room in turn was fitted with a series of different type enclosures. Measurements were taken and comparisons made with the results in the room where the radiator was left exposed. The factors taken into consideration in these comparisons were the temperature at the breathing level, the temperature at the ceiling, the mean temperature of the zone below the breathing level, and the relative steam condensation an hour.

Six types of metal enclosures were tested.

The conclusion was drawn that the difference between a satisfactory and an unsatisfactory radiator cover depends upon the opportunity given for the flow of air over the radiator, and the protection of the wall back of the radiator from the effect of direct radiation.

What the well designed radiator cover does is to throw the heat where it is needed and reduce the ordinary heat losses from the room. The unenclosed radiator sends a good deal of its heat to the wall back of it, and thereby some is lost; whereas the protecting back reflects the heat into the room. The unenclosed radiator, usually set beneath a window, passes a stream of hot air directly over the window, through which much is lost; whereas the solid top of the radiator cover deflects the current out into the room.

It is granted that an enclosure reduces the amount of direct radiant heat received by the inside surfaces of the walls and so reduces their surface temperature. But this small reduction, it is held, does not noticeably affect the comfort of the room's occupants, while, owing to the large area of the wall surfaces, it may represent an appreciable reduction in heat loss through the walls.

PRICELESS DOCUMENTS IN NATION'S ARCHIVES

After a Century and a Half, During Which Some of Them Have Been Perilously Housed, a Fireproof Home Has Now Been Planned for Them

By J. C. FITZPATRICK.

WITH exceptions so few as to be negligible, the valuable archives of the government in Washington are in buildings that are not fireproof. For more than a century the United States has been indifferent to the preservation of its records. The first fire of any consequence that damaged the government archives occurred in 1800; the latest, a sort of double-barrel affair at the White House and Capitol, only recently. Between these there have been both numerous and costly ones from the viewpoint of the destruction of records.

The average citizen is quite readily convinced that the United States should have a fireproof national archives building. Every nation has one except our own, and that is a good enough reason, even if there were no others. But because of the carelessness of this approval it has taken Congress nearly a century and a half to get around to the matter. Plans and a site for the new building have been proposed. If the average citizen knew what the government archives contain and the kind of papers to be found among the old records, his passive interest would become an active one.

Treasures Among Manuscripts.

A scant thirty minutes spent in the exhibition hall of the manuscript division of the Library of Congress, where only a few hundred selected pieces are on view, will make clear the tremendously interesting and valuable papers there are in the government files. Almost the first thing to be noticed is a small, faded document signed Martha Washington. It is the original of a letter to President John Adams agreeing to the transfer of George Washington's remains from Mount Vernon to the crypt vault beneath the rotunda of the United States Capitol.

That this permission, given the same month that Washington died, was not acted upon, is a matter of history which is explained and made clear by other papers in the government's archives. Just around the corner, in this same exhibition case, is a note from Benjamin Franklin to his one-time British friend Strahan, printer to the King at the outbreak of our Revolutionary War. After an excoriation of the British, such as only Franklin's clever pen could indite, he concludes with the famous, double-barbed politeness: "You and I were long friends; you are now my enemy, and I am yours, B. Franklin." Original manuscripts such as this speak to the eye and mind as no amount of cold type could ever do.

Besides the value which has enabled our historians to tell us the true story of the nation's growth, the government's records have an actual financial value which should make their care and preservation a matter of cold business. For example, take the manuscripts of George Washington, which were bought by the nation about 100 years ago for the officially avowed purpose of completing the government files at a total outlay of $45,000. Today, in a booming autograph market, a dozen or so separate manuscripts in this collection could be named offhand each one of which would readily sell for more than $45,000, and there are one or two for which eager collectors would be very likely to put in far higher bids.

The Records as History.

The wise savant who said, "No documents, no history," expressed only half of the idea; what he also meant was, "No records of the past, no understanding of the present and no guidance for the future." When a nation ignores or forgets its history, its wisdom has departed. A nation's records are its history.

An example close to us is the American Indian. He had no written language, and so the experience of his forebears was non-cumulative. So far as his history is concerned, it dates back only to the time of his first contact with the white man—it has a place in the white man's history only. There is no need to say, however, that even this partial and one-sided history is found in a most picturesque group of documents referring to a period that was equal, in color and romance, to the days when knighthood was in flower. The history is more exciting than the old Deadwood Dick dime thrillers.

Parchment treaties, carefully signed by chief and sachem, with drawings of turtle, fox, wolf and bear, are in the files of the Department of State; and in the Library of Congress are original records of treaty negotiations which bear the stirring names of the Six Nations, or the Creeks, some of which date back before our Revolutionary War began.

America's history is generally considered as beginning with Christopher Columbus. When the enemies of that distinguished navigator moved against him, one of his preparations for defense was to have copied out a legajo of his commissions, grants, privileges and honors received from Ferdinand and Isabella. Only four sets were made of these—three on parchment and one on paper—under Columbus's personal direction, and the Government of the United States possesses one of the parchment copies.

The exploration and colonization of the West Indies and Spanish America is represented by hundreds of documents in which the Panama Canal country early appears, but the Atlantic seaboard Colonies are of more immediate interest to us. On large sheets of hand-made linen paper, one-quarter the size of a newspaper page, are instructions to Benning Wentworth, Governor and Commander-in-Chief of our Province of New Hampshire. Attached are King George's own signature and the great seal of the Privy Council. Other huge sheets show the strength of the British forces in the different American stations, with the cost of maintaining the garrisons, all duly signed by the King and Privy Council.

When Thomas Jefferson sold his library to the United States to replace the Library of Congress, destroyed by the British in 1814, there came with his books a dozen or more of the earliest manuscript records of Virginia, which are now worth their weight in gold intrinsically, and historically are priceless. Hening used some of these in compiling his Statutes of Virginia. One of the documents is a copy more valuable than the original from which it was made. It is the proceedings of the London Company of Virginia during 1619-1624.

The copy was made surreptitiously in a lonely house on the outskirts of London while the King of England was moving to seize the company's records. So careful was the secretary in preparing this safeguard for the company that he attested the correctness not only of the entire record but of every separate sheet, to the number of hundreds. With the Tower of London, and perhaps the block, looming ahead, there was reason for great care. After the original was seized by the King, the copy was spirited out of England and sent to Virginia for safety.

Pre-Revolutionary Documents.

The outbreak of the War of the Revolution is pictured in hundreds of precious papers. An official copy of the Stamp act itself, printed in old black letter by the royal printer, is among the records. The non-importation agreement in Virginia, which George Washington, as a burgess, circulated among the freeholders of Fairfax County for signatures, is in the Library of Congress. The agreement was not quite to Washington's liking, so he added a "clincher" with his own pen to the printed form.

With the outbreak of the Revolution the mass of documents increases tremendously. The journals and papers of the Continental Congress alone fill nearly 500 huge volumes. Memorials and petitions to Congress in one group are really the condensed biographies of service of hundreds of patriots (some with the itching palm) which contain a mass of historical detail unmatched in value, unless we except the cherished applications for pensions growing out of the Revolutionary and other wars—documents now in the Pension Office.

Among the outstanding documents of the Revolution are the Articles of Association of the First Continental Congress in 1774, signed by every member of that body. This means that the paper bears the name of nearly every one of our Revolutionary War statesmen and thus stands as a worthy companion to the Declaration of Independence. With it should be counted the famous Agreement of Secrecy of 1775, in which the delegates of Congress bound themselves by honor and love of country not to divulge the proceedings of Congress in what we would now call executive session.

In the same class also properly belong the Articles of Confederation of 1778, which is our first United States Constitution, engrossed on parchment sheets which were afterward cleverly stitched together and carefully rolled upon a small mahogany roller with turned decorative ends. This is the most perfect example of the archival roll in American history and a reason for the offering up of devout thanks by American archivists that no great number of rolls exist in our government records, for when this document is unrolled it stretches out to the amazing distance of fourteen feet.

Of the actual fighting in the war for independence there are literally thousands of records, but nothing, of course, like the number of those which piled up in the late war in Europe. The A. E. F. papers alone cover about three acres of ground space. But the letters, orders, reports of military manoeuvres and battles, in the handwriting of George Washington, Nathanael Greene, Mad Anthony Wayne, John Paul Jones, the Marquis de Lafayette and scores of well-known commanders, numbering into the hundreds, are the identical papers from which our text book histories and more pretentious volumes have been written.

In the Department of State is the treaty of 1783 with Great Britain. Indeed, there are all the treaties negotiated by the United States from the French alliance treaty of 1778 to that of Versailles of 1919. The Constitution of the United States, on four huge parchment sheets, is on exhibition, with the Declaration of Independence, in the Library of Congress, and flanking them are Lincoln's Gettysburg address and second inaugural, in his own handwriting. The original journal of the Constitutional Convention and such papers as have survived of the proceedings are kept in a little red leather dressing box, studded with bright brass nails, that once belonged to Dolly Madison.

These are only a few of the valuable historical manuscripts which are the milestones of the nation's progress. In every one of the governmental departments are huge stores of records, the gold and precious stones of our national history in which gleam great documentary gems and nuggets of historical fact. The Ordinances of the Secession of the Southern States are in the Library of Congress, the records of the Confederate Government are in the War Department, and Grant's correspondence with Lee at Appomattox is a rare group of letters to be capped by Pershing's offer of the entire control of the American forces to Foch at the time of the great German drive in 1918. The Navy Department has scores of valuable and important documents; so has the General Land Office.

The average citizen has a real reverence and sentiment for old battle flags and swords of his country's heroes. Who would not thrill to touch the sword of Washington or handle the rifle of Daniel Boone? But how could we know the history of flag, sword or rifle if the records had not been preserved? Without our records relics can mean nothing, and the brave deeds of old can never be known. Yet, strangely enough, the United States has been the most negligent of all civilized countries in caring for its records.

LICORICE INDUSTRY REACHES SIXTIETH YEAR IN AMERICA

Leads the World Now in Extracting the Useful Virtues of This Long-Known Root

AMERICA'S licorice industry now observes an important birthday. Sixty years it has rounded out, furnishing flavoring for the country's tobacco and some of its chewing gum, stocking its medicine chest and delighting its children with "shoe-lace" candy.

In places where licorice grows naturally, its value has been availed of during thousands of years. In America it is an exotic. Yet in the threescore years since the root was first introduced on a commercial scale this country has taken the leadership in the quantity of licorice extracted. Not yet is it grown here, except now and then experimentally; but every year some 35,000 tons of the root are imported, to be converted by the licorice industry into forms demanded by a number of other industries.

In parts of Spain and Italy the plant is cultivated, but in general it is gathered in the wild state. From the fields of Southern Europe, Asia Minor, Southern Russia, Egypt and Arabia peasants dig it and carry it to the baling stations. The roots are dried, then pressed into bales weighing about 300 pounds. Over devious inland routes these are transported to the seacoasts and hoisted onto vessels bound for the United States.

In the American factory the roots are shredded, forming a coarse mass. The powdered licorice root, so important in pharmacy, is obtained by grinding and sifting and grinding again part of this mass. From the remainder the licorice is extracted in solution and this is evaporated by various processes to obtain the syrup and the paste needed by the confectioner and the powdered extract used by the pharmacist and tobacconist.

Licorice contains a substance known as glycyrrhizin, or "sweet root," which is fifty times as sweet as sugar. As a tonic, a blood purifier, a means of relief from catarrh, sore throat and internal inflammations, and, when mixed with honey, as a healer of sores and wounds, it is still widely used by peasants

Brewers used to introduce licorice into their beer to give it a "head" or foam. Now its foam-forming properties are utilized in an extinguisher that has proved particularly important in fighting oil fires. The oxygen-free foam cuts off the air supply and the fire ceases to burn. The liquid used for this purpose is the second extraction from the shredded root mass, after the materials needed by the pharmaceutical, tobacco and confectionery trades have been taken out.

The fiber left after this second extraction is dried and made into insulating wall and box board. Board from licorice fiber is said to be the best for those cards that control the design in the weaving of tapestry and other figured materials.

MANY VARIETIES OF DATE PALMS ARE TESTED BY THE GOVERNMENT

CULLING the inferior varieties of fruit trees from American orchards is a common practice, but when plant explorers of the United States Department of Agriculture observed that date growers in North Africa had destroyed their finest instead of the inferior varieties, they asked for an explanation.

Many years ago, they were told, the Arab rulers sent out agents to visit the date plantings and confiscate the best fruit. The Arabs soon learned that it was more profitable to grow the inferior varieties for the rulers without pay. Now some of these choice varieties are practically extinct in their native country.

The United States Government's experimental plantings in California, Arizona, Texas and Nevada are now said to contain a larger number of date varieties than are to be found in any one oasis of the Old World.

Scarcely a decade ago the date palm was little more than a botanical curiosity in the United States. Now it is the basis of a promising fruit industry. About 2,500 acres have been planted in dates.

MORE POWERFUL . . .

THAN ANY OTHER 6-CYLINDER ENGINE OF ITS SIZE

New 87 horsepower motor—Lines and colors of an entirely different style conception—Interiors that presage a new art in fine car upholstery and appointment

In the new Willys-Knight Great Six, the patented double sleeve-valve engine sweeps to further heights of power, smoothness and efficiency. America has no record of any six-cylinder engine of comparable size which develops as much torque and power as the masterful engine of the 1930 Great Six—a car now even faster and livelier than ever before.

This engine is clothed in a setting of regal beauty—lines and colors, coachwork and finish, interior upholstery and details different from those of any other fine car.

In the 1930 Willys-Knight "70-B," the superiorities of the sleeve-valve engine and the beauties of modern design interpreted by master artists, are available at a record low price for so large and powerful a car.

Dependable performance, low operating costs, simplicity of engine design and construction, make the 1930 Willys-Knights decidedly economical to own and drive.

Come in and see the new Willys-Knights, and arrange for a demonstration.

OLD CHINESE NEW YEAR SURVIVES INNOVATIONS

Despite Adoption of Western Calendar People Revert to the Ancient Date of Their Happiest Holiday—Revels That Follow Payment of Debts

By JAMES W. BENNETT.

THE Nationalist Government of China, in an attempt to conform to the same yardstick of time as the Occident, declared last Winter that the nation should celebrate Jan. 1 as the New Year anniversary. The Oriental, with his seven-day week of labor, was glad to agree. Another holiday? Well, there were few respites at best.

But his traditional holiday, the First Day of the First Moon—as indicated upon his ancient Lunar Calendar—was, nevertheless observed last year with a stubborn yet wistful punctilio. This year he plans to celebrate with positive enthusiasm, to revert with gusto, despite Nanking. From Jan. 29 to Feb. 2 (by Western reckoning) will see the height of his festivities.

Once in Shanghai I was the guest of a Chinese family during the New Year ceremonies. I reached the compound just as the final housecleaning was in progress. This spasm of neatness was to impress the Kitchen God who, later that evening, was to be released from his duty over the household and sent back to heaven to report.

He was represented by a lithograph. His features were done in the classic style with the long ear lobes that denote knowledge, the almond eyes, and the bushy whiskers. This lithograph hung over the great clay oven upon which many strangely shaped pots were simmering for the banquet to come. Red candles and incense were burned before him. The entire family, from the grandfather to a fat baby, all of 2 years old, bowed gravely before him. I bowed, also.

Rumor had it that occasionally the Kitchen God was base enough to make unpleasant reports on high about the household during the previous year. That risk must be nullified. The Tai-tai, the old grandmother, wabbled up to him on her tiny bound feet, and, producing a small pot of honey, sealed his lips by smearing them with the viscid fruit of the bee. Now, if he were able to speak at all, it would only be sweet words.

The Kitchen God's Ascension.

Next the portrait was removed from the wall. A candle was touched to the paper. The Kitchen God blazed for a brilliant moment, then became a sheet of gray-brown ash, while a thin spiral of ascending blue smoke attested the flight of his soul heavenward.

The last day of the old year was filled with many other preparations. Stunted peach, pear and plum trees were brought into the courtyards. Their branches had been twisted during their growth so that now they simulated the outlines of the good luck and happiness ideographs. Prayerfully had they been tended by the gardeners, in order that the "first of a thousand blossoms" might bloom on New Year's Day—and not before. One recalcitrant tree, I saw, was hurried to the kitchen. There, after being exposed to the heat of an oven, its buds began vigorously to open.

Great horn lanterns with the shou character for longevity painted in splashy red ideographs were hung in the halls and corridors. Across the doors vermilion strips with ideographs brushed in gold leaf were pasted. The legend read: "Life and Death, Adversity and Happiness, All Are Decided by Heaven."

As the sun dropped into a clear, frosty western horizon, a sharp clatter arose at the outer gates. Congregated in the lane outside were a dozen men. All carried long, lighted tapers which they carefully shielded from the wind. One by one they approached my host and held out slips of flimsy paper on which had been brushed spidery ideographs. He examined these gravely. Then, extracting a fat, clinking purse from a girdle about his waist, he began to pay over various sums of money.

The Debt Paying.

"Those were tradesmen," he told me. "They collect their debts at this time. As long as their candles remain alight they can continue to make their collections."

"What if the wind blows out a candle?" I asked.

He smiled. "Actually if money is still due to them, they sneak down a side alley and light up again."

"But what happens if they reach the house of a bankrupt, some one with no money to pay them at this season?"

"That's bad," he said seriously. "If the debt is very large, the creditor will make a loud outcry and attract the neighbors and the passers-by in the lane. He will tell the throng that his debtor has just refused to pay. Thus he makes the person owing him lose face—such great face that the poor debtor dares not show himself during the next year. I know of several cases where debtors, to rehabilitate their repute, have committed suicide. By doing that they gain back their neighbors' esteem."

"You mean their spirits gained it," I said.

"Isn't that the same thing?" my host asked in some surprise. "Are not the spirits of our ancestors always around us?"

In the banquet hall the feast was ready. This, although we had been eating all day long! Nien Kao, New Year's cakes, had been constantly thrust before us by smiling servants. These were fashioned, I was told, of sugar, rice flour and yeast, then steamed. Owing to the yeast, they were light and puffy. Various other dishes symbolic of the season had been placed before us: Olives, denoting long life, lotus seeds with beatitude as a reward for eating them, apples to signify that the house would enjoy peace in the year to come.

Several of the old grandfather's other sons had arrived from far places. One of them had traveled nearly two weeks by ox cart and sailing junk to reach home at this time. His action perfectly emphasized China's greatest strength: the solidarity of her family life and the sacrifices its members will make to retain this. For each house is a nation in miniature, governed by its eldest male, who wields patriarchal power of life and death over his subject-children.

At the banquet that followed, rice wine spouted hot and pungent from the narrow stems of chased pewter flagons. Lichees from the far south of China were eaten. Sharks' fins and Javanese birds' nest soup made their inevitable appearance. Less welcome to me, yet apparently a much prized delicacy, was a dish of fat white grubs that had originally lodged themselves in the stalks of sugar cane. Twenty different varieties of sea food were interspersed with as many variations of duck, pheasant and bamboo partridge. Bear paws and deer sinews added to the novelty—for me, at least.

At dawn the revelers arose. This was the time for audience before the head of the house. We entered a large, bare room—the ancestral hall. At the end of this, upon a magnificently carved altar table of Chinese redwood, were grouped many narrow slabs of highly lacquered wood. Each was etched in gold with the ideographs of an ancestor's name. In each of them a part of the dead person's finite spirit was presumed to reside.

We were met by the grandfather, gorgeous now in a long gown heavy with gold thread. His face was grave, even austere, befitting the man who in his person represented a line unbroken for five centuries.

He bowed to the central shrine; to the gods of heaven and earth; next, to the tablets of his progenitors. Then he turned to receive the solemn homage of his children.

Slowly they advanced across the stone flagging. Coming to a stop some three feet from him, each bowed. There were three bows, a pause, three more, a second pause and then a final three. First his sons, then his grandsons. Even that precious baby toddled up and ducked his shaven head with its ridiculous topknot seven times—becoming mixed on his count at that moment.

Following the men, the womenfolk paid their respects in the same fashion. They were brilliant in jackets of peacock satin, short, silver-banded trousers and jade or turquoise embroidered slippers. First came his Great Wife, then his two elderly concubines; next, his sons' Great and Small Wives; lastly, his girl grandchildren. His married daughters were not present, since at their wedding they had become lost to the clan and today must make their genuflections before their husbands' fathers.

This ceremony finished, the family settled itself to the major business of the day—gambling. Tables were brought out and mahjong sets appeared. They played with a rapidity that set me to marveling. The children engaged in a game of dice and moving buttons along a board called "Eight Fairies Cross the Sea." It was not unlike the American child's game of lotto, except that the Chinese youngsters were gambling on each cast of the dice. Even my favorite, the 2-year-old grandson, was precociously playing.

During the afternoon there came a pause in the gambling, while the family trooped to the court to witness the efforts of a puppet showman. He played several ancient and delightful comedies dedicated to the season.

Other divertissement followed. A boy dressed as a tiger wove grotesquely about the court. A second strolling boy trooper appeared in a dragon's costume. He portrayed that legendary beast vainly striving to grasp the flaming pearl always just beyond his grasp—a neat little parable of man's futile reach for the unattainable.

Beggars came asking alms. None was refused, not even a shock-headed, mewing idiot in filthy rags and a leper with hands half eaten away.

During all this time no one yawned; none of the family seemed to feel the need for sleep. Everywhere I was met by smiles and by soft, gracious words of felicitation—the expression of hope for prosperity during the ensuing year; hope that the Feng Shui, those potent demons of wind and water, would prove beneficient; hope that the dreaded Fox Maidens would not dog my footsteps.

That night another banquet was spread, quite as elaborate as the first. The next day, more gambling and puppet theatricals.

"How long does this keep up?" I asked somewhat wanly of my host.

"With many persons, for a month. With all of us, until the Feast of the Lanterns on the fifteenth day of the first moon."

"But don't you ever take time off to sleep?"

"A little," he answered. "But then, you see, one can always sleep and work. The entire year is left. This season comes but once. This is the happiest holiday in China. We are not a religious people, but this holiday finds us in a religious mood. For during this season we worship all the beneficent forces that have molded our lives and have brought us our share of happiness. That in itself is not a bad religion, is it?"

THE MENNONITES IN RUSSIA ONCE MORE ARE ON THE MOVE

Seeking Refuge in New World, Many Are Bound for Canada and Brazil

THE Mennonites are on the move again. Or rather the restlessness that has been manifest among their scattered communities since the World War is spurting again, with migrations hither and yon. Russia is the source of today's concerted movement. Canada and Brazil are its objectives. Recently Germany has received 5,800 Russian Mennonites, a large number of whom hope to journey on to Canada and another group to Brazil with funds advanced by the German Government and by Mennonite organizations. From Canada, too, the Mennonites are moving further south.

Upon this movement bear dispatches saying that 13,000 Mennonites had trekked all the way from their home on the lower Volga to Moscow to ask leave to emigrate; that barely 1,000 succeeded after many hardships in getting into Germany and that 9,000 were herded on convoy trains and shipped back to their abandoned villages.

The story of the Mennonites for four centuries has been one of recurring conflict with their surroundings. In the beginning their denial of the Christian character of the existing church and the civil authority brought down upon them the bitter persecutions of Protestants and Catholics wherever they lifted their heads in Europe. Their endeavor to carry out literally what they believe to be the teachings of the New Testament has ever been at such odds with the ways of the modern world that every haven they have found has proved, sooner or later, a haven no more. Their doctrine of non-resistance has left them but one recourse, to seek another. And so they have moved on, one generation of them after another, in the quest of a home free from wars, where they may be excused without question from military service.

A MENNONITE

One of the Younger Members of the Sect.

Wherever they have gone they have attempted to guard their strict conservatism by formal agreement with the government of the country, excusing them from oath-taking and guaranteeing to them the right to maintain their own community apart from the rest of the world, speaking their own language, conducting their own schools and following their own primitive customs. But invariably difficulties have been encountered and the Mennonites have departed.

Prior to the twentieth century three major Mennonite migrations are traced. Freedom-loving America long represented the promised land to these reformers whom Europe harassed, and hither they turned from southern Germany, Switzerland, the Palatinate and Alsace. This vast movement falls into two distinct periods: one from 1690 up to the Revolutionary War, to the neighborhood of Franconia and Lancaster, Pa.; the other from 1820 to 1860 to Berne, Ind., Bluffton, Ohio, Fulton County, Ohio, Central Illinois and Iowa. Altogether it is estimated that between 7,000 and 9,000 came in this migration and in time they spread from their original destinations to other localities.

The second great movement of Mennonites was from Eastern and Western Prussia to Southern Russia in the years between 1789 and 1840. Catherine the Great, no doubt seeing in these industrious folk an example to all peasant people, invited them to settle territory along the lower Volga that had recently been wrested from the Turks. She assured them freedom from military service, the right to their own schools and semi-autonomy for their communities.

Some 9,000 availed themselves of the inducements she offered, and so did they thrive that by 1917 their progeny had multiplied to 100,000 or so, in spite of the fact that this colony was the supply source of the third great Mennonite migration, which took place between 1873 and 1880, with America the goal.

A Decade of Migration.

The major migration, however, was initiated by the World War. In the decade from 1917 to 1927, it is said, more Mennonites changed their national home than in the four centuries preceding. But barely 500 managed to get through the gates of the United States before the new quota laws barred them. Canada proved more friendly. Altogether some 20,000 went there.

For many, however, disappointment was the reward of venturing. Even those who had come before were far from happy. People who not only refused a part in the war, which was of much importance to Canada, but even expressed indifference to its outcome and insisted blindly upon adhering to the German tongue, naturally had none too good a name. Some of them, in disrepute, determined to pull up stakes and go to Mexico. Others had gone there before them—those unable to pass the stringent health tests.

A colony of several hundred had been established in Chihuahua, 300 miles south of El Paso, and another at Irapuato, 300 miles north of Mexico City. These had had their troubles from internal disagreement and thieving of neighbors. Nevertheless, 5,000 more Mennonites turned to Mexico from Canada, and in a valley thirty miles long by fifteen miles wide twenty-four villages were established.

Meantime, the Mennonites of Canada were still casting about for a country that might truly prove to be the promised land. One day about three years ago a strange-looking contingent of men with long coats and long beards and women in swishing skirts and bright shawls passed through New York. They were bound for South America.

Thousands have followed them under an arrangement that has allowed them to trade in their Canadian holdings for transportation, land and equipment in the new country, the idea being that the deserted farms of Manitoba would be readily taken over by more Mennonites coming from Russia.

CONVENTIONS ON THE SIDEWALK MARK BUSY NEW YORK NOON HOUR

AT the noon hour many streets of New York are plagued with "sidewalk conventions." Some pertain to various trades; others seem to have no business at all. On Seventh Avenue, at about Forty-fourth Street, for instance, a line of men and women stands along the curb outside the theatrical booking agencies. In loud tones they discuss their chances of getting on, and more often than not tell of the bookings they should have received.

Further down Seventh Avenue, in the fur and clothing district, small crowds also gather, and the talk is largely of "shop." Over on Sixth Avenue, in the Thirties and Forties, job-hunters gather outside employment agencies and exchange hard-luck stories. Down in lower Broadway, in the financial district, however, these "conventions" are not large nor do they last long. The Wall Street crowd is generally too busy, as long as the ticker tape is running. Conventions here, if there are any, continue until the bell at 3 o'clock announces the end of trading.

NEGRO HIGH SCHOOLS.

THE Southern States are building high schools for colored youths faster than trained colored teachers can be prepared for them. More than 300 negro high schools are maintained in the South. Eight years ago, says B. C. Caldwell, field director of the Jeanes and Slater Funds for Negro Education, there were only eleven.

PASSENGER AIR SERVICES STRIVE FOR CUT IN COSTS

With Reduced Fares Even Maximum Loads Are Now Carried At Loss Per Mile—Solution Seen in Flexible Equipment Plus Greater Express and Mail Poundage

By LAUREN D. LYMAN.

SINCE the first of the year a number of the major transport systems have cut their tariffs to a point where they approximate rail fare on the de luxe trains. First among the big systems to make a permanent cut was Transcontinental Air Transport-Maddux Air Lines. Operating since last July, this system, which, with the Pennsylvania and Santa Fé Railroads, carries its passengers across the country in forty-eight hours, has cut its fares to $159.52, less than half of the original cost.

Its action was followed by Western Air Express, which operates an eleven-hour service between Los Angeles and Kansas City and had already made drastic cuts on some of its Western divisions. On this system, in collaboration with the Santa Fé and New York Central lines, it is possible to travel between the coasts in forty-six hours at a cost of about $190, which is still above the rail fare, plus Pullman, on the best trains, but much below what is regarded as the ordinary air transport rate.

Close after Western Air came widespread cuts on the air transport companies operating under the aegis of Aviation Corporation, including the train-plane-train, sixty-hour New York and Los Angeles schedule, in which Universal Air Lines joins with the New York Central and Santa Fe.

The cuts met with almost instant response in the way of increased air travel, and to this extent the air lines are satisfied. The price reductions came during a period of extended bad weather. Yet, in spite of this bad weather, T. A. T. reports an increase in air travel of more than 100 per cent. Reports from the other systems are not yet available, but officials of all the systems concerned feel, in the words of a Universal operations man, that "the problem of filling the planes is not one of fear but of fare. The 'e' was in the wrong place."

Rates have come from 15 and 20 cents a passenger mile down to 5 cents in the case of T. A. T. and some of the other lines.

Costs Exceed Revenue.

A glance at cost sheets indicates clearly enough that no transport line, operating with present equipment and present operation charges, can make money on air passenger transport alone. For example, one of the systems concerned admits that the ten-passenger trimotored planes on its line cost about $1.42 a passenger mile to operate. This transport, loaded to capacity, is earning but 50 cents a mile. For every mile flown, then, even with capacity loads, this system is losing something like 92 cents.

If, as has happened frequently and is likely to happen more frequently in the immediate future, fourteen or fifteen passengers are available, either another ten-passenger plane costing $1.42 the flying mile must be sent out or a larger plane must be flown. One company has two eighteen-passenger planes, but at five cents a mile per passenger even these big planes are earning but 90 cents a mile.

Other air lines have brought their operating costs down to $1.25 and $1.20 a mile, but until far greater loads can be carried and further drastic economies effected they will be operating at a loss as far as straight passenger service is concerned.

The picture from the money-making standpoint is still more discouraging when one considers the figures not only of past performance in air transport but in other established fields of transportation. For example, it is said that the railroads operate their passenger systems at about 40 per cent capacity. This figure of course is not accurate for specific systems and routes, but it tells a story, especially when one considers that the railroads of the United States obtain but 16 or 17 per cent of their income from passenger transport. The air lines carrying passengers have been operating at from 16 to 32 per cent capacity.

What is the answer? Why are the air lines cutting their rates so drastically? Is this a cut-throat rate war in which only the rugged will survive and through which the aircraft industry is likely to suffer further depression?

Change in Methods Indicated.

The operators for the most part think they see the answer and deny any rate-war talk. First, they plan definitely to cut operation costs. They plan to operate faster planes and more economical planes than the conventional ten and twelve passenger trimotors. Several conservative operators, and many pilots, either never have dropped their belief in or are now adopting the doctrine of single-motored planes as against multimotored for both efficiency and safety.

Such authorities as Grover Loening and G. M. Bellanca have consistently held to the theory that the single-motored plane is not only as safe as that with two or three engines but, in many circumstances where danger is present, safer. Certainly, most recent accidents could not be traced to motor failure, which is the main safety argument for multimotored planes. As a matter of record there is some doubt as to whether more lives have been lost in single-motored planes than in multimotored. Moreover, there have been some rather bad crashes of multimotored planes in which motor failure has been advanced as a cause.

It is more economical to load four passengers or six passengers into a fast, single-motored plane of the Bellanca or Lockheed type than it is to carry the same number of passengers in a trimotored plane. Chance Vought has long held the theory that the fast, single-engined cabin plane has a great future in commercial operation as a supplementary aircraft to the large carriers, and he has already designed such a plane, but has been prevented from building it by the pressure of his foreign and domestic government contracts.

Arguments for One Motor.

Another point in favor of the single-engined transport is that emphasized by many seasoned pilots—among them such fliers as Clarence D. Chamberlin—is its greater manoeuveability. A forced landing is always a possible contingency because of weather and other uncertainties of flight. The smaller plane can get down and into fields where landings for large transports would be out of question without crack-ups that might prove serious.

Operators all over the country are seriously considering these factors, and it would not be surprising to see some of our great air transport systems equipped with supplementary fleets of some small four and six passenger monoplanes. In fact, Boeing, with its passenger and mail planes, Southwest Fast Air Express, Western Air Express and the Pan-American system, are now using single-engined planes to advantage on many routes for passenger, mail and express loads. The Boeing 40 has long been in use, with its mail and passenger compartment ahead of the pilot, and its use is not likely to decrease.

Another way in which the air lines hope to make up deficits is through air mail and express. Postmaster General Brown has definitely stated that he favors granting new mail contracts to established passenger and express lines rather than the creation of new and exclusive air mail lines. There is a vast amount of emergency express for which no present system of transport is fast enough to meet the demand. The airplane, more than any other form of carrier, does meet this demand and is being used more and more.

Of interest is the pioneer service started by General John F. O'Ryan on his Colonial system in collaboration with the Western Union by which transport from door to door is assured without undue effort on the part of the transmitter or receiver of goods. Other like systems will be tried and eventually it is expected that some part of the 39,000,000 pounds of "premium freight" carried by the express companies each day in the United States will travel by air. It would not take a very large fraction of it to maintain quite a fleet of planes.

However, much of this business is still far in the future, and the air lines that have cut their rates are thinking in terms of the present. Besides effecting further operation economies, they consider the low rate as an important part of their merchandising program. It has been charged that one important weakness in the aeronautical industry is lack of proper merchandising methods, and this charge is being taken seriously by many leaders in the industry. The cutting of fares to the point where more persons can afford to ride is deemed likely to be an important factor in the business of selling aviation to the not-so-air-minded public.

PLANES BRING RUSSIAN CHURCH TO COLONIAL STRATFORD TOWN

THE old New England village of Stratford, Conn., which through a century of industrial change in the State has maintained its Colonial tradition and aspect, is at last succumbing to the new. Its directory is filling with strange new names such as Gluhareff, Sinitzin, Petroff, Sergievsky, Utgoff, Tolstoy, Timkovsky, Koodroof, Kisselevitch, Toochkoff, Sikorsky.

The establishment of the Sikorsky Aviation Corporation on the edge of the village, with almost 1,000 employes, among them many royalist émigrés, is changing the complexion of Stratford. The town now has a Russian church, Russian social life, and the Russian tongue is frequently heard along its Main Street.

St. Nicholas Church, just established in Stratford, is one of two congregations in Connecticut under the authority of the Archbishop of the Orthodox Russian Church. The new church was consecrated last Sunday at 37 Lake Street, in the Avon Park section of the town, where the majority of the Russian families settled.

George Meyrer, factory manager of the airplane company; Igor I. Sikorsky, Professor N. Alexandroff and other executives and technical experts of the company are prominent in the congregation. Just as the meeting house was the first structure built by the founding fathers in Stratford, after shelter for their families had been provided, so do the interests of the town's newest citizens turn naturally to provision for the practice of their religion, as their first common activity after settling there.

NEW COWLING AIDS SPEED.

THE use of a modification of the N. A. C. A. cowling by the Boeing Airplane Company on the new single-seater fighter, it is reported from Seattle, has added eleven miles an hour to the speed of this plane. The engineers experimented for a long time, first with the N. A. C. A. cowling and then with the British approximation of it, the Townend ring. The Boeing ring partakes of the features of both designs. The engineers experimented with venturi cowlings with several different angles of incidence on the leading edge and finally arrived at the one the company is now trying both on its fighters and its transport planes. Streamlining and, especially, landing gear changes have further added to the speed.

NO little interest attaches to the official production figures for aircraft in the year 1929, as issued last week by the Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce. From it it appears that 6,034 commercial and military planes were produced in the United States last year, far fewer than was predicted early last year, but an increase over 1928 production of 1,815 planes. The value of the 6,000 odd planes, without engines, was $44,457,300. The addition of motors brings the total to $98,000,000. Of the totals, 5,537 planes, valued at $33,624,756, were of commercial types, while 677 military planes were valued at $10,832,544. Commercial production showed an increase of 51 per cent. Military production, on the other hand, fell off 44 per cent, as compared with the 1928 figures. The report does not indicate how many of the commercial planes were sold, but confines itself to those that were turned out by the manufacturers.

WHEN it comes to an analysis of type, many trends in airplane development become manifest. For example, open cockpit biplanes played a major rôle in the production figures with closed cockpit monoplanes in second place. One of the most impressive, although, because of their versitility, not surprising, gains was that made by amphibians.

"Amphibians increased 368 per cent," the report says, "showing a marked interest in this type. Multimotored monoplanes increased 207 per cent over 1928; flying boats and seaplanes, 190 per cent. Open cockpit monoplanes increased 81 per cent; closed cockpit monoplanes, 80 per cent; multi-motored biplanes, 60 per cent, and open cockpit biplanes, 30 per cent. The closed cockpit biplane decreased 32 per cent.

It appears that the ratio of monoplanes to biplanes is increasing sharply. While the biplanes exceeded the monoplanes manufactured in 1928 by 124 per cent, in 1929 only 51 per cent more biplanes were produced.

ONE of the important phases of aviation, viewed as an industry, is receiving the closest scrutiny of operators at this time. This is the problem of making air transportation a paying proposition, especially from the passenger-carrying viewpoint. Some of its perplexing angles are discussed more fully elsewhere on these pages. Drastic cuts in rates, both transcontinental and intermediate, have marked the last few weeks. They have been made in the face of the fact that even at previous rates—in some cases well-nigh double those now in force—maximum loads would not pay.

One may reasonably ask the question, why cut rates under such circumstances? The answer of the operators is that they deem it wise and necessary to stimulate patronage, to merchandise more widely the commodity they have to sell, even at a temporary and considerable loss. Greatly increased patronage would eliminate one horn of the dilemma. The banishment of the other horn is a problem even more fundamental—the cutting of costs.

THE lines along which this major operation may be accomplished appear to be several. Among them may be mentioned greater flexibility of equipment exemplified by a range of plane sizes rather than too fixed a standardized type or capacity. This would permit, it is held, of sending out planes to suit the needs of the traffic on a given day rather than flying big and costly planes partly empty. On the one hand, as has been indicated in this column heretofore, economies would seem to indicate the use of larger and still larger planes. A number of operators appear to feel, however, that these should be supplemented by small, manoeuvrable passenger carriers, economical to operate.

GROWING ROLE OF RADIO RECOGNIZED BY AVIATION

Liaison Committee of Two Industries Appointed, While Aids Of Wireless to Flight Abroad and in America Are Summarized by Radio Engineers

By T. R. KENNEDY JR.

RADIO has become, in the last year or two, one of the handiest tools in the service kit of the airman. This fact received official recognition recently in the appointment by the Government of the United States, announced by Clarence M. Young, Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Aeronautics, of a liaison committee on aeronautical radio research. The purpose of the new body is to survey recent research in radio as applied to the problems of aviation, with a view to an early solution of its most pressing problems with a minimum of duplicated effort.

The committee consists of Harry H. Blee, director of aeronautical development, Department of Commerce, as chairman; Dr. J. H. Dellinger of the Bureau of Standards, secretary, and Herbert Hoover Jr.; Lieut. Commander D. B. Duncan, Bureau of Aeronautics, Navy Department; F. C. Hingsburg, Department of Commerce; Dr. Lewis M. Hull, Radio Manufacturers' Association; George W. Lewis, National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics; Captain H. M. McClelland, Air Corps; F. M. Ryan, Institute of Radio Engineers; Wesley L. Smith, American Air Transport Association, and Ray Stearns, National Electrical Manufacturers' Association.

The various applications of radio in air navigation, its importance in these several phases of usefulness, are attested by the fact that an entire issue of the proceedings of the Institute of Radio Engineers has been set aside to tell the story of theoretical and practical achievements with radio in aeronautics up to the present time. The international radio body numbers among its members lay investigators, engineers and scientists who delve into the problems of the radio art in all its various and complicated angles.

Edward H. Furnival of Marconi's Wireless Telegraph Company, London, tells of the system in operation on British airways. All European systems follow, to a greater or less degree, the general principles and procedure maintained by the British.

Two-way communication by radio telephony and telegraphy from ground to air and vice versa is required, with reliable working distances normally up to 100 or 150 miles, with the possibility of longer ranges being attainable up to a maximum of 250 miles when planes are working with main airport stations. Ground stations must be capable of giving directive reception so that bearings may be taken on the transmissions from aircraft. By coordinated operation of a group of such stations, positions of aircraft can be ascertained by triangulation and radioed to the craft needing such information.

Single bearings, which may greatly aid air navigators in time of need, are given out by individual ground stations so equipped. The wave length in use is 900 meters. A separate radio telegraph system on another wave is provided for inter-airdrome traffic, and a telegraph broadcasting service on still another wave disseminates meteorological information to the airmen.

Chief Uses of Service.

The British deem that aircraft-to-ground communication is needful for distress calls, reporting position and progress, acknowledgment of messages, position finding by ground stations, weather reports from the upper air strata, announcement of changes in courses or destination and service messages.

Ground-to-plane communication is needful for weather reports, bearings and positions, reporting to pilots on the proximity of other aircraft, acknowledgment of messages and passing on service information.

Telephony is praised as a communication medium for aircraft because adequate communication without the aid of a "professional" wireless man is provided; encroachment on the "pay load" of the machine is avoided, since a radio man need not be carried and communication is "quick"—the pilot being able to speak directly with a responsible official on the ground. In the larger machines and flying boats of the Empire routes, where the radio must normally cover greater distances, an operator is carried to work the long-range telegraph sets.

Direction-Finding Means.

The most generally used system of direction finding is that which has directive receiving stations on the earth. A network of such installations has sprung up for this purpose, Mr. Furnival points out, to serve the needs of commercial aviation throughout Europe. Through these stations it has become a practice to handle much of the regular message traffic, using the same radio receiver system for all purposes. Where machines fly long distances off the organized routes they carry special radio direction-finding apparatus in addition to the regular transmitting and receiving sets.

In most cases transmitter and receiver are mounted in one box, which is attached at the corners to rubber shock absorbers. The radiating system, or antenna, is a wire let out from a pipe beneath the machine with a weight attached to the end of the wire. This system has proved very efficient and hence has been almost universally adopted. It also has the advantage of being a good pick-up wire for the receiver, and is used as such. By a simple switch the operator changes from send to receive or from voice to code transmission.

In Germany radio engineering is playing a very important part in things aeronautical. Radio sets are being required in increasing numbers for transmitting information to and from airplanes and ground stations, for determination of courses and for safety. It is said that in Germany many flights cannot be completed at all without radio aid. The German engineers consider well-planned air transportation "is hardly possible without aircraft radio, and regularity of transportation cannot be attained without the aid of radio." F. Eisner and H. Fassbender of the Deutschen Versuchsanstalt fur Luftfahrt E. V. describe the technical status and the organization for its application in that country.

Short Waves Used.

Short-wave reception has been found to present considerably greater difficulties than transmitting in the airplane. Vibration causes a fluctuation resulting in complete cessation of tone in the receiver. For this reason a quartz crystal controlled, short-wave receiver, with a long-wave intermediate frequency stage, has been developed. In this set the received tone caused by the transmitter can be varied at will by the receiver operator. All difficulties in short-wave reception in airplanes can be removed, it is reported, if short waves are used only for transmission from the planes, while the long waves are used for communication from ground to aircraft.

The German air transportation system has a number of ground direction finding stations which determine the location of airplanes by bearing on request, then radio the information to the plane or planes seeking the information. The stations use a rotating loop. The operation consists of receiving the signal from the plane, determining its line of propagation by means of rotating the loop until a minimum signal is heard, then reading it from a circular scale attached to the shaft of the loop. Small, light-weight apparatus has been developed.

LIGHT WEIGHT AND EFFICIENCY SEEN IN NEW TWO-CYCLE MOTOR

A NEW six-cylinder, air-cooled radial motor, which is said to weigh but 110 pounds and to develop seventy-five horsepower, has completed its 950th hour of test running, according to J. Schubert, its designer, of the Aircraft and Industral Motors Corporation, 136 West Fifty-second Street. It had been inspected by many aeronautical engineers, he said last week, all of whom were said to have expressed wonderment at the efficiency of the weight-power distribution and the novel features of its construction.

It is an adaptation of the old two-cycle principle and is of 3 by 3½ inch, bore and stroke. Each piston is of the "step" type, the step closing a chamber at the base of the cylinder, which acts as a meter for the charge of the cylinder following. A new method of cutting a slot into the inner and upper rim of the step makes a seal in contact with the base of the cylinder wall. As all six cylinders fire in pairs once each revolution, the action is much the same as a larger motor of the four-cycle type.

Most interesting in the engine is the crankshaft and connecting-rod assembly. The cylinders are not staggered along the two-throw shaft, but are so spaced that each can accommodate a full connecting rod with a centred one-inch roller bearing. The drive is indirect through a set of rider gears at the forward end of the two-piece crankcase, making possible gear reduction without added weight.

The inventor said that a recent fuel test showed consumption of less than .40 pounds per horsepower-hour. The fuel contains 10 per cent lubricating oil, the only lubrication which the motor used during its 950 hours of running, he added.

Officials of the company said that they were at present engaged in obtaining a factory site and would manufacture the engine in units of 75, 150, 200, 300 and 450 horsepower.

FAST TRANSPORT FLIGHTS.

THREE fast flights were recently made by Imperial Airways pilots. A. L. Robinson, piloting a triple-screw air-liner carrying seventeen passengers and a crew of three, flew from Croydon to Paris in only ninety-five minutes, an average speed of 145 miles an hour, while A. C. Wilcockson piloted a second air-liner, weighing nearly nine tons, from London to Brussels in a flying time of only ninety-three minutes. B. Youell also covered the distance of approximately 225 miles from London to Paris in ninety-five minutes. The machine carried twenty passengers.

CARBON MONOXIDE GAS DENATURED AT EXHAUST

Dr. Frazer's New Device Muffles Automobile Engine Noise And Renders Fumes Innocuous—Strange Character Of the Poison Puffed Into Air of Streets

The achievements of the machine age keep the world always fighting a rear-guard action against their inadvertent by-products. One of the most dangerous of these, carbon monoxide gas, has lately been receiving wide attention, and a device has just been designed to destroy it as it is generated in one of its commonest sources, the automobile.

The carbon monoxide as a menace is not yet considered widespread enough to cause alarm. Such small quantities reach the ordinary citizen that, according to recent tests, it is not likely to harm him. But it has already come to be a harassing accompaniment to much of our progress. It has appeared to haunt some of our basic industrial activities and it has become so common in city life that it is called "the city poison."

Its part in mine disasters is a familiar one. Although gas masks have been perfected to protect rescuers against mishaps—chiefly by the same man who has brought out the new automobile device, Dr. J. C. W. Frazer, chairman of the Department of Chemistry at Johns Hopkins University—carbon monoxide frequently takes its toll before they come into play. It is a source of danger in the use of gas heat, if the fuel is burned too long in a closed room, and it is generated by electrical installations that have caught fire. In fact, the gas is apt to be present wherever burning is going on if combustion is not complete.

A Subtle Poison.

Now the gas has been brought more directly into the daily lives of all city dwellers by the concentration of automobiles. Every automobile whose engine is running is discharging a stream of it into the air through its exhaust. Considering that in the city of New York alone there are some 600,000 automobiles, the problem of what the output of this poisonous gas is doing to us, or may do if not defeated, is being taken with increasing seriousness.

Carbon monoxide is a deadly gas. None of our senses protects us sufficiently against it, because it is colorless, odorless, tasteless and non-irritating, and yet it can do its work without the victim's knowing what is happening to him, other than that he has a headache or a feeling of nausea.

It is a poison of a quite unusual kind. Its danger lies in its strong affinity for the hemoglobin of the blood or oxygen-carrying vesicles. When breathed into the lungs it unites with the hemoglobin some 300 times as readily as the oxygen, with the result that, as more and more is breathed in, the hemoglobin becomes saturated with the carbon monoxide, which the body cannot use, and has less and less capacity for carrying oxygen, without which life cannot go on. The victim, in effect, is quietly suffocated.

Fortunately carbon monoxide cannot suffocate all at once. It would be rare that enough of a concentration of carbon monoxide would be found in a lungful of air to saturate a large proportion of the oxygen carriers at one time; and although there is a record of the death of a 7-weeks-old baby when the blood saturation had reached only 18 per cent, a healthy man has so much reserve power that he can live until from 60 to 70 per cent of his oxygen carriers are saturated.

Not Readily Expelled.

But the characteristic of carbon monoxide that makes it a special hazard of city life is that though it cannot always claim its victims quickly it often goes about the job steadily, even when present in seemingly small amounts. It is not readily expelled from the hemoglobin, so that once they are pre-empted the union lasts for a time, and—within certain limits—each new supply of the gas taken into the lungs adds to the total carriers put out of use.

The United States Bureau of Mines has made extensive tests of this phase in view of the dosing automobiles give cities, and has found that while a person can stay for several hours in an atmosphere containing two parts carbon monoxide to 10,000 of air without feeling discomforting effects, even with mild exercise, one of three to 10,000 began to produce unfavorable symptoms in two hours; and one of four to 10,000 in slightly less time. As a result it is thought that to keep a good reserve of safety a person should not be subjected to a stronger concentration than four parts in 10,000 for more than an hour. Even in that time about one-fifth of his oxygen-carrying blood supply may be put out of use until a return to good air has restored it.

Such a decision does not put the automobile into the class of menaces so long as it is out on an open road where its exhaust is quickly lost in the air. But it means that in connection with the other developments of urban life it has largely brought about it presents some large-scale problems. In automobile exhaust it has been found by the Bureau of Mines, somewhere between .5 and 14 per cent of the total volume consists of carbon monoxide. The average is usually around 7 per cent, although it rises at times, especially in city traffic when the car is idling and the driver keeps stepping on the accelerator to keep his engine from stalling.

Pour that quantity of carbon monoxide into a small private garage for a short time with the door closed and a person breathing the atmosphere will quickly be overcome. In Winter fatalities are numerous, according to the New York Board of Health, for this is the time men who have to work over their cars are tempted to close the garage doors and start the engine for warmth.

Health authorities are issuing warnings not to keep automobile windows closed when exhaust from the engine is used for heat. Many cars have installations for using the exhaust for this purpose. But the deaths and headaches that have been caused when leaks allowed the gas to escape into the car's body have led some manufacturers to abandon the device.

It is the changes that have come with the widening use of the automobile, however, that have aroused concern over how the growing gas attack is to be met. The large commercial garage presents in many cases, according to the United States Public Health Service, a "dangerous condition that demands the serious attention of those concerned." When the Holland Tunnel was built its exceptional length necessitated extensive studies to determine how large the ventilating plants would have to be to reduce the carbon monoxide to a harmless amount. The chief engineer, C. M. Holland, pointed out that the power required for supplying the air to dilute it would be only about one-fifth as much if the amount of gas could be left only slightly greater.

The effect on cities of the gassing done by heavy traffic is still a subject of discussion. Tests made for the New York Board of Health recently by Professor H. H. Sheldon of New York University resulted in the conclusion that although dangerously high concentrations of carbon monoxide occurred near points where large numbers of motor vehicles stood "idling," the "condition was too transient to be considered a real menace."

In Philadelphia, however, tests made on traffic policemen at busy intersections after the tours of duty showed blood saturations up to as high as 30 per cent, and Chicago health officials in discussing the problem in their city have remarked that the constant pollution of the air will tend to reduce the chances of those who have to live and work in it of having robust health.

Dr. Frazer's special interest in carbon monoxide started in 1917 when the Chemical Warfare Service established a branch at Johns Hopkins with him in charge. Sailors firing guns in the turrets of ships were being bothered by the gas, and Dr. Frazer and some associates from the University of California perfected a protective gas mask. The same mask was later adopted for mine rescuers.

The new departure in his recent invention, however, amounts to a more direct attack on the gas. Heretofore persons who were endangered were supplied with masks as a defense, but this time the gas is to be destroyed as it is made.

The New Invention.

In the first case the problem was simpler because the gas could be handled at ordinary temperatures and at a moderate rate of speed. This time it had to be handled as a hot blast fresh from the engine explosion, which must not be impeded in making its escape lest it slow up the operation of the engine.

His device has proved its ability to make the carbon monoxide "change its spots." It becomes carbon dioxide, the same gas that is breathed out of human lungs and which is harmless except in very large quantities. The transformation is achieved by what the chemist calls a catalyst, a substance that will make a chemical reaction take place without itself being used up, and the process goes on automatically as fast as the gas is passed through it.

Dr. Frazer's device will take the place of the ordinary automobile muffler, doing the muffling besides transforming the carbon monoxide. Moreover, it will destroy the elements of the automobile exhaust that smell bad and burn up the bluish soot usually given off—two services that are expected to win it more popular favor even than its destruction of the deadly carbon monoxide.

SOVIET RUSSIA'S EXPERIMENT IN INDUSTRIALIZING A NATION

lower and middle peasant groups, to develop State farming on a large scale, and to form collective farming organizations and cooperative organizations. It plans to invest 28,000,000,000 rubles in agriculture in the period.

The outstanding phase of the program is the upbuilding of the socialized area in agriculture. Recent news dispatches indicate that rapid progress is being made, and that 70,000,000 acres will be "collectivized" by 1931, instead of by 1933. These collective farms are to include about 20,000,000 persons.

The guiding practical idea behind the organizational form of collective farming is the establishment of central machinery and tractor stations, each serving a group of villages. Eventually they are to be transformed into centres of power supply and agricultural aid in a broad sense. There are now, it is estimated, about 23,000 tractors in the country; in 1933 it is expected that there will be 170,000 tractors available in the socialized sector. Market technique, application of fertilizers and scientific methods are the factors upon which the project depends.

For the current agricultural year the quota of 13,000,000 metric tons of grain for the reserve fund was completely furnished as early as Dec. 1, 1929.

Textiles.

The production of textile goods is well above the pre-war level, and in each of the last two years the Soviets, in addition, exported about $25,000,000 worth of cotton cloth.

In 1913 the output of cotton yarn was given as 270,800 metric tons; in 1924-5, 189,500; in 1927-8, 312,962, and in 1928-9, 342,086. The planned output for 1929-30 is 394,400 metric tons. Finished cotton cloth production in 1913 was given as 2,400,000,000 meters; in 1928-9, 2,824,717,000 meters. The output of woolen yarn in 1913 was given as 46,000 metric tons; in 1928-9, 52,557 metric tons. Woolen cloth increased from 84,500,000 meters in 1913 to 114,749,000 meters in 1928-9. Linen showed a similar increase.

The original schedule of production of cotton fiber under the five-year plan was for 590,000 metric tons for 1933, but this figure has already been revised to 785,000 metric tons. Irrigation projects are to be carried out in the Central Asiatic regions, and by 1933 it is expected that 90 per cent of the farms will be mechanized. Machinery and fertilizers are to be furnished.

Shoes and Leather.

Factory production of leather shoes in pre-war years was only 5,500,000 pairs annually, the bulk of the demand having been satisfied by cobblers and imports. This was about doubled in 1924-5, when the output was given as 10,500,000 pairs. The production for 1925-6 was put at 12,000,000 pairs; for 1926-7 at 15,279,000 pairs; for 1927-8 at 23,500,000 pairs, and for 1928-9 at 42,000,000 pairs.

According to the program of the five-year plan, the production of shoes in factories under the supervision of the Supreme Economic Council of the U. S. S. R. will amount in 1932-3 to 80,000,000 pairs, and the total production of shoes in all factories is scheduled to reach about 145,000,000 pairs that year. Even then, it will be noted, annual shoe production will still be less than one pair per capita of population.

To assure the necessary supply of raw materials, the Council proposes to utilize to a greater extent the so-called secondary sources—hides of dogs, swine, camels and sea-animals—and to increase the number of domestic live stock.

POLES IN PERU.

CULTIVATION of coffee, cacao, lumber and cotton has already been begun in Peru by Polish immigrants. About 10,000 families are expected to leave Poland. Of these 250 are already in Peru, living along the shores of the Apurimac River, the section Peru has allotted to the syndicate in charge of the Polish movement.

INDIANS PROTEST AGAINST BEING USED AS SIDE-SHOWS

They Find War Dances and Other Exhibitions Incompatible With Betterment Policy

A PROTEST against using the Indian as a side-show for people from the East who make Western trips, and against commercializing barbaric customs hundreds of years old to give color to celebrations of historic events of fairs has been made to the United States Government. A letter complaining of the situation was recently sent to Secretary of the Interior Wilbur from the Episcopal Convocation of Sioux Indians assembled at Mission, S. D., signed by Nevill Joyner, missionary, and Clayton High Wolf, assistant priest. As published in the magazine The Spirit of Missions, it read in part as follows:

"The white man would not care to be entertained by what was done in the dark ages of his past. But the Indians, with the consent of the government, are asked to forget their pigs and cows, and tilling of the soil, the many years they spent in government school, to turn their eyes away from a future of industry and independence and to turn back the pages of a wild and unenlightened past. What a fine inspiration for the Indians to see their wild life displayed on every moving automobile weeks in advance of one of these celebrations! How it must increase his self-respect! How it must inspire him to make progress along these industrial lines that the government is spending so many hundreds of thousands of dollars to teach him!

"It is a matter of common knowledge that no little town in all this region can have its annual fair in the Fall of the year without the Indians. Always he is called in. His home and the affairs of home that make home are neglected and he is demoralized.

"We cannot understand the policy of our government that uses one hand so lavishly and apparently so sincerely for our betterment in the material and intellectual things of life and yet withholds the other, as though it were paralyzed, from any interference with the observance of those habits and customs that belong to the dark ages of Indian life. We wish to make it very clear that we do not consider the war whoop, the war paint, the war dance, and the tomahawk emblems of industry, of settled God-fearing homes, of Christian civilization. Yes, we should really like to understand what the policy of our government is or is likely to be.

"It cannot be, after using the best brains you can get for the Indian service and after the expenditure of huge sums of money either from tribal funds or otherwise, that our young men and young women of the third generation are to be graduated into the dark ages amid the applause of a sordid element of white people whose only aim and desire is to exploit the Indian.

"We are not speaking in sarcasm but in all sincerity when we say that if it be necessary from any point of view to preserve the Indian customs of the dark ages of Indian history, let there be an Indian Zoo located, say, in the Black Hills or in Yellowstone Park, have no expense of schools and hospitals with teachers and nurses, let it be a real live zoo and conducted on a paying basis for the entertainment of the low and curious whites and let the proceeds be used by us who are in God's name doing what we can to become industrious, independent, God-fearing citizens, an honor to our government and to our native land."

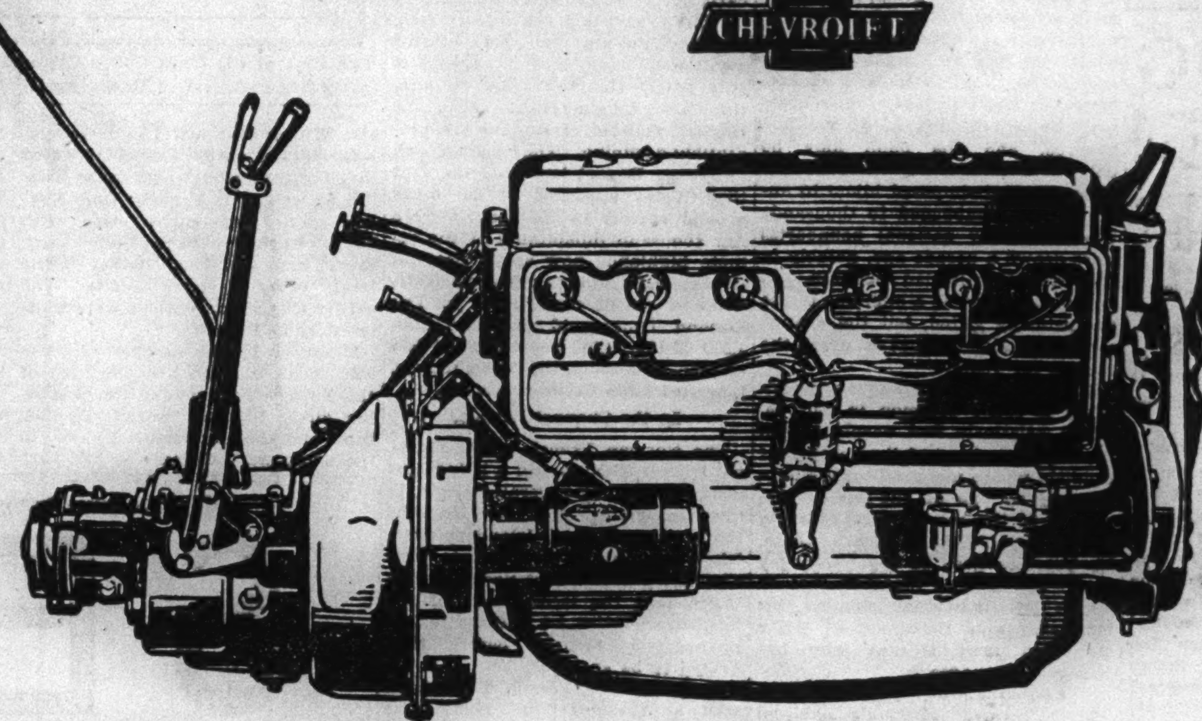
WALTZING MICE TO AID MINERS

Japanese Animals Found Responsive to Gases In the Earth

JAPANESE waltzing mice have at last been put to a practical use. For years canaries have been used in mines to serve as warning signals of the presence of carbon monoxide gas. When the birds collapsed the miners would go scurrying to safety, but the canaries were found to be affected just a scant margin before the danger point.

In comparative tests at the Pittsburgh experiment station of the Bureau of Mines it was found that the waltzing mice showed signs of response to carbon monoxide far sooner than the birds. It was also found that they quickly recover in a few minutes.

The Japanese waltzing mouse is found in Japan and China. The mouse runs around in circles, wide or narrow or in a figure eight, many times in succession. On other occasions it pivots on one foot, making gyroscopic circles without stopping. Officials making the tests believe that the incessant activity of the mice makes it more apparent when the gas begins to affect them.



CHEVROLET

50 horsepower six cylinder engine

Not until you drive the new Chevrolet Six can you appreciate what a wonderful improvement has been made in its famous six-cylinder valve-in-head engine. With its capacity increased to 50 horsepower, it has great reserve energy for sweeping up the steepest hills—for swift acceleration—and for sustained high speeds. Its power flows evenly and smoothly. And it is extremely flexible in traffic. In fact—it does everything you could possibly want a motor to do. Yet it is remarkably economical to operate. Come in today!

LANGUAGES ARE STILL A LIVE ISSUE IN EUROPE

Nationalist Revivals Following the War Have Added to the Modern Babel and Suggest the Need of a Census Covering The 120 Forms of Speech of the Continent

By HAROLD CALLENDER.

LONDON.

THE Belgian Government was overthrown recently on the question of whether Flemish or French should be the language of the University of Ghent, thus revealing the acuteness of the language question which divides the Belgians. Meanwhile, an appropriation for the teaching of Gaelic in University College, Galway, has brought a similar issue to a head in Ireland, where some go so far as to insist upon the resuscitation of a virtually dead language. In Upper Adige, a part of the Tyrol annexed from Germany, the Italians have undertaken to obliterate the German tongue; while, in Alsace, which France recovered from Germany, French officials and teachers are seeking to make French, instead of the traditional German dialect, the dominant language.

Languages, inevitably mixed up with nationalism, are often the subject of bitter political strife in Europe, and the linguistic map is as complicated, if not more complicated than ever. With the assistance of the governments and the League of Nations, the International Linguistic Congress purposes to undertake a language census to show just how complicated the language map, properly drawn, is. The object is the compilation of a linguistic atlas which would show the precise scope and status of every language and dialect now spoken. It probably would reveal an actual increase in the number of languages, and it would prove highly useful to statesmen as well as to philologists.

Languages at the Peace Parley.

When the peace conference met in Paris a decade ago, apostles of linguistic groups that few persons excepting philologists had ever heard of opened propaganda offices and hired press agents to convince the powerful that they must have each a government, a flag and an official language—or at least the status of a national minority under protection of the great powers. Their success may be judged by the fact that, when new State boundaries were drawn, languages played a greater part than they had played in any previous European conference.

According to M. Tesnière of the University of Strasbourg, who has studied the subject exhaustively, 120 languages (exclusive of dialects) are now spoken in Europe. Nineteen of these tongues are spoken each by 5,000,000 people or more, while thirty-seven are spoken each by about 1,000,000 people. Among the languages that have been revived and extended in recent years are the Icelandic, the Lithuanian, the Latvian, the Finnish, the Estonian and the Albanian.

Young writers, fired by nationalism, have tried to do for their native dialects what Mistral tried to do for the ancient and declining Provençal language in France. For them political independence was not enough. They wanted their people to cling to the traditional tongue, even if it were a langauge unknown outside a restricted area and even though its revival tended toward the intellectual isolation of the nation officially adopting it.

A French critic recently called attention to a book on Sénancour; he had reason to believe it was a scholarly work, but since it was written in Finnish he could not be sure. "Who reads Finnish?" he asked. There are about 3,000,000 people in Finland. Not all of them speak Finnish, and probably not quite all of those speaking Finnish would buy a critical essay on Sénancour. But the Finns, like other European people, are deeply attached to their language, not merely as a form of speech but also as a form of literary expression.

Tongues That Survive.

Probably the Finns' fondness for their ancient tongue was only increased by the attempts of the Czars to replace it with Russian. In France, which is the most centralized and one of the most unified of European nations, Breton, Provençal, Basque and Alsatian speech have persisted for centuries, though the revolutionaries and the modern school system have made determined efforts to extirpate them.

When Poland was divided among three great powers the Polish people clung all the more stubbornly to their language; and now that their dream of a free Poland has been realized the foreign minorities within their borders consider it necessary to defend their traditional tongues agai-t the Polish administration. Cultural attachments sometimes prove stronger even than economic interests. After the German annexation of Alsace in 1871 nearly 300,000 French left the province, some abandoning businesses rather than send their children to German schools.

Geographical limits of a language seldom are easy to trace, especially in multilingual areas, and witnesses usually disagree. The German-speaking population of Czechoslovakia, for example, is not counted in the same manner by the German and the Czech governments. Considerate as the peacemakers were of the speech of the peoples whose destinies they decided, there remains a suficient disparity between political boundaries and linguistic frontiers to supply nationalists of many varieties with a permanent object of indignation.

Friction attributed to cultural and linguistic differences is widespread, as revealed at the last session of the Council of the League of Nations when the question of the national minorities came up. Among these minorities, protected by treaties made under auspices of the League, are the Germans, Jews, White Russians and Ukrainians in Poland; the Germans, Magyars, Ukrainians and Poles in Czechoslovakia; the Germans, Magyars and Italians in Yugoslavia; and the Germans, Magyars, Turks, Bulgars and Serbs now governed by Rumania. Germany is the leading champion among the powers of these minorities, since so many of them are German.

A Part of Schooling.

In some European countries the schoolboy learns several languages in the normal course of his education. He may absorb one in the cradle; learning a second, the official language of his State, in the primary school, and later acquiring, for purposes of scholarship or trade, an additional modern tongue or so, to say nothing of Latin and Greek. Moreover, the language of the schools may be at the mercy of political hazards, and the pupil may be obliged to shift almost overnight from one State-imposed idiom to another. This happened to thousands when the new national boundaries were drawn a decade ago, notably in the case of Alsatian children. It doubtless served as a stimulus to the linguistically gifted, but the change came so suddenly that it upset the schools for years.

Changing from one language to another is fairly common in Europe, where relatively few people are in the happy position of the speaker of English, whose maternal tongue happens to be one of the major languages of the world, thus relieving him of the obligation to learn others. M. Tesnière goes so far as to say that "the normal State is that in which the individual changes his language; nine times out of ten a cultivated man is one who has changed languages."

Changing One's Language.

The changing of one's habitual language is a stimulating process, and it is not necessarily an arduous one if the shift is made at an early age. Alert children often appear to learn two or three languages almost as readily as one, and without apparent effort. For a mature person the acquisition of a new language is usually a laborious, if sometimes also an exhilarating, experience. Those who think they can "pick up" languages without studying invariably betray the fact that their foreign tongue is merely "picked up," not learned. The educated Alsatian or Swiss who speaks and writes French and German equally well manifests a bilingual facility rarely attained by those who have not grown up in a linguistic borderland which enjoys a sort of double culture.

There are some, on the other hand, who speak two languages but speak them both imperfectly. A certain Paris physician, born in England but educated in France, speaks English with a marked French accent, and French with a slight English accent. Brizeux has discussed the case of the young Breton who, though having partly lost his habit of speaking Breton, has not yet fully acquired French; who "no longer quite speaks Breton and not yet quite speaks French." Thousands of young persons in France are at this half-way point in the transition from their local speech to French, which for them is an acquired, not a maternal, tongue. Thanks to an excellent school system, they will make the shift with perfect success, speaking French as though it were their native language and gradually sloughing off the dialect.

A writer in the Frankfurter Zeitung described the futile endeavor of two German soldiers, working in Northern France during the war, to communicate in the German language. One was from the North, the other from Bavaria. The Northerner asked the Bavarian to lend him his hatchet, but the Bavarian, thinking he meant to keep it, was unwilling. Unable to make himself understood in his own tongue, the Northerner resorted to words he had learned in occupied France, saying, "Touteswite retuhr"; whereupon the Bavarian, in similarly imperfect French, replied, "Wui, wui, compris." Thus it was only with the aid of French words that the two Germans managed to carry on a simple conversation.

While it still is possible for a Londoner to find numerous places in his own island where the local speech is only partly comprehensible to him, the Celtic languages and even the English dialects of Britain are perceptibly declining. The recent Welsh Language Report lamented the fact that Welsh appeared to be losing ground rapidly to English. Only a few thousand inhabitants of the remote highlands now speak Scottish Gaelic, and few speak it exclusively, while a recent contributor to The London Times said that less than 1,000 of the 50,000 people in the Isle of Man now spoke the Manx tongue, inherited from Celtic times.

In the Channel Islands.

The Norman French of the Channel Islands, though still a living language embracing several dialects, is likewise giving way to English, though the Channel Islanders cherish it as a relic of their remote past. The Yorkshire Dialect Society lately urged that the local patois of the English counties be transmitted to phonograph records before they ceased to be spoken.

In France the French dialects, as well as the surviving non-French tongues, are slowly receding before the advance of the national language, which is the only tongue enjoying the support of the State. The dialects give way more readily, the transition from them to French being easier than the transition from the Celtic speech of Brittany or the German of Alsace. Within a radius of about 200 miles of Paris the local patois have almost disappeared.

In the South, where the local dialects derive from another Romance language, the Provençal, the resistance is more stubborn. Professor Ripert and the Félibrige still strive to revive and purify the Provençal language and demand that it be admitted to a place in the schools. In the villages and in the country the prevailing speech is one or another of the Provençal dialects, though virtually everybody speaks, or at least understands, French as well. Still, France is far from being unilingual. M. Tesnière computing that more than 10,000,000 of its 40,000,000 inhabitants habitually speak Provençal, while about 1,000,000 speak Breton and more than 1,000,000 the Germanic dialects of Alsace and Lorraine.

Meanwhile, as some Frenchmen lament, the French tongue has lost ground as a world language, chiefly because of the spread of English. At the beginning of the Peace Conference of 1919 there was a long discussion of the language question. Mr. Wilson and Mr. Lloyd George, who did not speak French, insisted that the treaty be drawn up in English as well as in French; thus English gained an equal place with French as the language of diplomacy, the French and English text of the treaty being of equal validity. The earlier Hague conventions were written only in French.

Measured by the number of those who speak it, French is the fifth of the European languages, German being first, Russian second, English third and Italian fourth. Ranked in the same way, Chinese is the first of all living languages, English second, Russian third, German fourth, Spanish fifth, Japanese sixth, Bengali seventh, French eighth and Italian ninth. Nearly one-fourth of the population of the earth speaks Chinese, while the seven next greatest languages embrace about half the world's population. M. Tesnière estimates that there are not less than 1,500 languages in all, 120 of them in Europe. The number and extent of all the forms of speech would be more precisely determined if the survey proposed by the philologists were made.

SENATE EPITHET "JACKASS" NOT SO BAD AS IT SOUNDED

The Mule Is Sober and Industrious, and Monuments Glorify Its Deeds

AMONG animals mentioned in the recent news the one of most political interest is the wild jackass. This is due to the impression that it was somehow discourteous and derogatory for a Senator from the manufacturing East to refer to Senators from the agricultural West as "sons of wild jackasses" because of their obstinacy toward a high tariff. Nothing in native experience or parlance justifies the notion that that is the sort of nickname which would split a great party, if, as cowboys used to insist, it is said with a smile.

In countries where the jackass remains wild his characteristics are fleetness, agility, endurance; he is hard to catch and put a halter on. Once tamed, it is proverbial that "he endures the load but not the overload," and when he feels himself put upon the lesson of the ages is that it is good to hold him by the bridle, not the croup. For this temper, sometimes exasperating, he has been secretly admired. Only through exercising a similar spirited self-respect did man rise from serfdom.

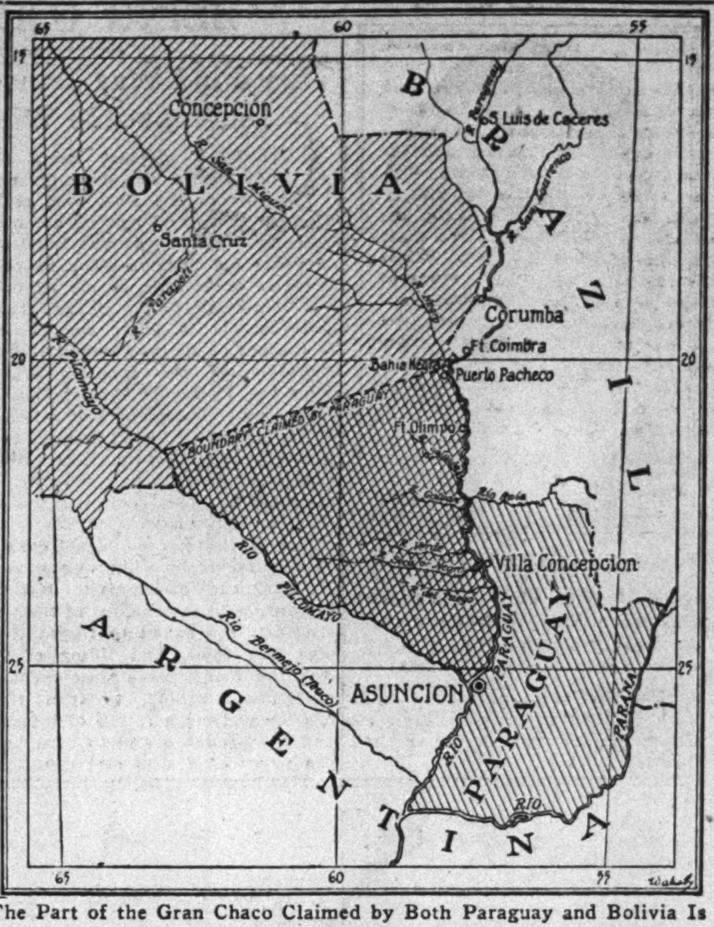
Patience is one of the jack's high qualities; it is expressed in his attitude, his sober gait. All children love him. Perhaps they retain mental images of him in such powerfully painted pictures as "The Stable at Bethlehem," or "The Flight Into Egypt," or, looking into his wistful eyes, remember how he chided Balaam for his iniquity. In the West people have erected monuments to the ass for the aid it rendered to prospectors in opening up the country's mineral wealth. In the corrals there the predestined offspring of the jackass is the mule. This in fact is what the Senator from the East called the unyielding Senators from the West—mules.

Outside the pale of Senatorial courtesy it is not disparaging to be called a mule—if the tone is right. The mule has helped the farm and the army through too many difficulties to be in bad repute. It inherits in full strain the sire's trait of suddenly going into reverse, but there is always a reason; and it inherits the quality of stubbornness, which has its uses, military and political. No one has forgotten how a display of it recently by a Cabinet Minister abroad made him a hero at home. Stubbornness or mulishness is simply the resistance of the opposition to one's own firmness, stanchness and similar virtuous attitudes.

What there is of disparagement in the epithet "jackass" was put there by foreign essayists and story writers long ago, writing of the breed developed under goads and hard labor in far away lands. They added to his burdens by giving him a bad name, twisting his self-defensive and independent habits by simile and metaphor till the dictionaries took notice and registered the usage, making jackass a synonym for a blockhead, or a foolish, wrong-headed fellow.

Naturalists say there is no American occasion for such an association of ideas. Here he has borne his part as pioneer since the days of the conquistadores, and his scion—one of the triumphs of Western science, like the spineless cactus—has been the army pet and part of its symbolism.

VAST TERRITORY IN DISPUTE



The Part of the Gran Chaco Claimed by Both Paraguay and Bolivia Is Shown by Cross-Hatching.

FIGHTING REVIVES OLD CHACO FEUD

Paraguay and Bolivia, Unable to Agree On Peace Terms Prepared at Washington Conference, Again Clash in a Vast Wilderness

SMALL bodies of troops maintained by Bolivia and Paraguay in fifty little forts scattered through the vast wilderness of the Gran Chaco in the heart of South America have clashed again, bringing to another climax the old territorial dispute which nearly caused an outbreak of war in December, 1928. Bolivia and Paraguay each reports an attack by troops of the other, and each reports one fatality. While the encounters in themselves are thus apparently not serious, they represent a setback in the labors of pacification which have been carried on since the close of the Washington conference last September through the good offices of Uruguay. The three large A B C powers have stood aside during the whole of the negotiations and the Foreign Office of Montevideo was left alone to act as peacemaker.

Two delegates from the Uruguayan Foreign Office were in Asunción, capital of Paraguay, endeavoring to persuade the Paraguayans to accept the latest peace formula when the recent outbreaks occurred. The question had been narrowed down to the manner in which Bolivia and Paraguay should make reparation for the clashes of a year ago. Paraguay was to restore to Bolivi· Fort Vanguardia, destroyed by ·s forces and Bolivia was to return ·o Paraguay Fort Boquerón, seized by its forces in retaliation. This was the program of the Washington conference which sought to re-establish diplomatic relations, to wipe out old scores and to bring the final settlement of the boundary before a board of arbitration. The hitch came early this month when Bolivia announced that she would withdraw from Fort Boquerón only when Fort Vanguardia had been rebuilt and turned over to her by Paraguay. To this Paraguay replied that the terms of the settlement must be carried out simultaneously, especially in view of the fact that the Bolivians had built other forts in the neighborhood of Boquerón, which made occupation of her old position dangerous.

In view of the international and internal complications, the settlement of the Chaco controversy becomes more difficult. How seriously Washington regards the boundary impasse is made plain by the note which Secretary Stimson dispatched to Asunción and La Paz at the close of the Washington conference, which automatically ceased to function on Sept. 13. The note includes this statement, after reviewing the success of the conference in preventing hostilities:

"The fundamental question, however, remains, and while it is unsettled there is almost as much danger as there was last December that further unfortunate incidents may occur. In this connection it may be mentioned that there are some fifty-two forts belonging to the two parties facing one another in the Chaco and that relatively large bodies of troops from both sides are concentrated there."

Heart of the Controversy.

The heart of the Chaco controversy has proved to be the lack of a formula acceptable to Paraguay and Bolivia covering the matter to be arbitrated. The Washington commission approached such a formula when it proposed that Bolivia should recognize Paraguay's undisputed right to that part of the Chaco lying between the Rio Verde and the Pilcomayo, while Paraguay should recognize Bolivia's right to an outlet on the Paraguay River in the vicinity of Bahia Negra. The final boundary would then be fixed by arbitration somewhere between the two lines, i. e., between the northern line from Bahia Negra to the Pilcomayo and the southern line from the Rio Verde to the Pilcomayo. Bolivia agreed to this limited arbitration, but Paraguay insists that Bolivian title to any part of the Chaco remains to be proved.

While the Gran Chaco has come to loom so large on the international horizon—all the nations of the Western Hemisphere having been asked to take an interest in it and the attention of the League of Nations having been called to the threat of war there—the place itself remains mysterious and untraveled.

The name Chaco has been applied to several thousand square miles of plains, swamps, rivers and forest lands in the heart of the South American Continent, spreading over parts of Argentina, Paraguay, Bolivia and Brazil. Boundary lines have been laid down in the shadowy territory except in that part of the Chaco included in the wedge between the Paraguay and Pilcomayo Rivers.

Bolivia's interest in establishing claims to the Chaco became accentuated following the loss of her Pacific Coast territory in her war against Chile. The Paraguay River offers Bolivia an outlet for boats of deep draft to the Atlantic through the Rio de la Plata. Bolivia's own large rivers flow northward into the Amazon system—a much longer and as yet undeveloped way to the open sea. There is no rail and no good road connection between the populous centres of Bolivia and the Paraguay, and should Bolivia succeed in obtaining a good port on that river it would remain for her to invest a large sum in opening means of transportation.

Paraguay, whose towns and ranches lie just across the river from the disputed territory, has been active for many years in promoting such development as has taken place in the Chaco. Lands have been parceled out by the Asunción authorities for cattle grazing, and adventurous companies have gone in there to cut the quebracho wood, from which tannin is made. But the Chaco just now is important as an armed frontier, with forts extending through the wilds and troops there facing each other, while in the capitals of Bolivia and Paraguay emotions and politics are swayed by a question which is held to involve national honor.

OLD AGE RELIEF LAWS URGED FOR NEW YORK

Renewed Effort Will Begin With Commission's Report to Legislature in February—Measures in Force in Ten States and Thirty-eight Other Lands

By VIRGINIA POPE.

THE public conscience is being increasingly stirred in the United States by the appeal made on behalf of its aged and indigent citizens. The subject is often brought to the attention of the Federal Government. Bills relating to old-age relief are before nearly every State Legislature, and ten States have enacted relief laws. In New York State a commission appointed by Governor Roosevelt is studying the problem of providing for the aged. In relation to this subject the Governor stated in his recent message to the Legislature that in his opinion all taxpayers should help care for those unable to support themselves in their old age instead of permitting the burden to rest upon the "generous and charitable."

The States seek to provide assistance to those who are not in need of institutional care and who can, with some help, maintain themselves in their homes. Those who are fostering the movement have endeavored so to construct the machinery of administration that the beneficiary will keep his self-respect in asking for and receiving aid. Under conditions prevailing until recently the taint of the poor laws clung to relief measures, and many men or women who had devoted lifetimes to honest labor have suffered the pangs of hunger rather than be classed among paupers.

The word "assistance" is finding its way into the titles of many of the laws, particularly those most recently enacted. California, for example, amended its law, changing its name to "An Act to Provide Protection, Welfare and Assistance to Aged Persons in Need."

In New York State, where an exhaustive study is being made of old-age security, stress is being laid on the necessity of providing "assistance" for those who because of disabilities are unable to maintain themselves without aid.

The Age of Those in Need.

The candidate for old-age security is generally 65 or more. In the United States it is estimated that there are 5,500,000 persons who have attained or passed this age. Of these, one-third are said to be partly or wholly dependent on others for their livelihood. One insurance authority divides this large group in two classes: the industrial and the social. In the industrial class are the workers who have some claim on industry for years of service rendered; in the social class are the professional men, the small shopkeepers, the drifters, the non-workers and others, who can look only to public or private charity for succor. The second group this authority assumes to be the smaller, a statement that lacks adequate statistical support.

Leaders in industry are doing much to humanize the business machines they head by devising pension plans, of which there are some 400 in operation; and, lacking these, by carrying superannuated and disabled employes on their payrolls. But the immense labor turnover, as well as the continuous readjustment of industry, must be taken into consideration. Moreover, only the most successful industries are sufficiently wealthy to carry the financial burden of extensive pensions or insurance systems. Investigation shows that only 6 per cent of the industrial companies employ more than 100 persons. Assuming that the majority have adopted some form of insurance or pensions for those who have been in their service for a given length of time (the range is from twenty to forty years), there is no guarantee that the plans will continue to function indefinitely—that is, as long as the company lasts—unless a trust fund is created to care for the liabilities.

The Labor Turnover.

The laborer, moreover, is a migratory factor. Murray W. Latimer, in a recently made survey, found that in five large companies only 2 per cent of the employes who began with the concerns at the age of 25 remained until they were 65. Approximately one-third of those working at 45 stayed on for the next twenty years; but only after that high-water mark of middle age was passed did they show a desire to remain permanently fixed. Other investigations have shown that less than 4 per cent of the men and 3 per cent of the women employed stay with the same company for twenty years or more.

There are several contributory causes to the heavy labor turnover. Men and women follow the normal desire to better themselves. They enter seasonal occupations; sometimes strikes throw them out of work; some industries spring up mushroomlike and vanish as quickly; the migratory instinct carries others from one locality to another; and many are thrown out of employment by accident and illness. So it happens that not more than 10 per cent of those working where pension plans are in operation ever benefit by them.

The group referred to belongs, economically speaking, to the lowest stratum of workers—those whose earnings scarcely warrant a bank account. What, then, is their financial status as they grow old? There are no adequate national figures, but a fair idea may, however, be obtained from a report made by the Massachusetts State Commission of Pensions, based on the most exhaustive and authoritative studies of old-age dependency made to date.

Of a total of 17,557 individuals selected as typical of the State's aged, it was found that 40.8 per cent possessed property valued at $5,000 or more. As to income, 14.6 per cent had $1,000 or more; 6.2 per cent had between $700 and $999; 6 per cent had from $400 to $699; 9.2 had from $100 to $399; 6.4 per cent had less than $100, and 16.8 per cent had no income.

The majority of aged dependents in the United States have no substantial system of protection to which they can look forward. (Only the United States, India and China among the large countries have not made some constructive arrangement for the care of their aged workers.) For the homeless, the helpless, the physically and mentally defective, almshouses are in increasing measure becoming the last refuge of the penniless. The United States pauper census, in 1923, showed that of 78,090 population in the almshouses, 53.8 per cent were 65 years old or over, an increase of more than 10 per cent over the same age group for 1910.

Outgrowth of Poor Law.

The poorhouse is an outgrowth of the English poor law and workhouse, nearly three centuries old. Into it in the past was shunted a heterogeneous lot of abandoned humanity. Then came a day when States and counties recognized the horror of the congested conditions, and instituted "outdoor" or home relief. Frequently this developed into a mighty system of graft against which it was necessary to legislate—this was the case at one time in New York City—and only private charity and the institutions were left to look after the poor.

As the burden of charity cases grew the science of social service was evolved to salvage human beings from the scrap-heap. Children are now being removed from almshouses; mental defectives are being placed in asylums; those suffering from disease are being sent to the proper institutions. And now a more humane society is seeking to keep the old who still have something to contribute to life from being relegated to the drab atmosphere of the poorhouse. State governments are assuming the responsibility of "assisting" them.

Governor Roosevelt's Message.

"No greater tragedy exists in modern civilization than the aged, worn-out worker, who, after a life of ceaseless effort and useful productivity, must look forward for his declining years to a poorhouse," said Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt in his message to the Legislature, in which he urged the creation of a commission to study security against old-age poverty.

At the same time the Governor pointed out the high cost of maintaining the aged in almshouses. The United States Department of Labor through the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that in New York State the capital value invested, per inmate, in sixty-one institutions was $1,773.49, and that the annual maintenance cost per person was $299.19. This statement is especially interesting in view of the fact that in those States where old age pensions are in operation the average amount paid per person is $20 a month, or $240 a year.

Old age pension bills have been intermittently introduced in State Legislatures for the last two decades. Montana, Nevada, Wisconsin, Kentucky, Colorado, Maryland, California, Minnesota, Utah, Wyoming and the territory of Alaska, have placed such measures on their statute books. In 1929, some fifty bills were introduced in the Legislatures of twenty-seven States; and in Delaware, Illinois, New Jersey, Nebraska, Texas and Washington bills passed one branch of the Legislature.

The laws passed are similar in certain fundamentals. Recipients of relief must be American citizens and the term of residence in the State prior to application is usually fifteen years. It is generally expected that no beneficiary shall own property valued at $3,000 or more; that relatives of applicants shall not be in a position to support them; and that such income as they may have shall not exceed $1 a day. The applicants must not be vagrants or inmates of public institutions. Relief may be given on a graduated scale, which in most cases may not exceed a maximum of $30 a month. The pensionable age is 70, with exceptions, when it is placed at 65. The laws differ in the type of administrative machinery set up; nor have the States assumed a uniform policy in regard to county cooperation.

The California Act.

The California act, which, according to Abraham Epstein, secretary of the American Association of Old-Age Security, represents the soundest measure yet adopted by an American State, went into effect on Jan. 1. Its provisions are mandatory upon the counties. In 1927 the Legislature authorized the Department of Welfare to report and make recommendations, some of which were incorporated in the law. Asserting that the unfit should have institutional care, the department expressed the opinion that "for those who were able to keep a home, who were able-bodied, or partially supported, there should be social provision by a local agency and adequate support through a system of State aid for the aged, financed by combined State and county funds."

In Minnesota, where the relief measure but recently received the endorsement of Governor Theodore Christianson, the counties may accept or reject the law, which must be "submitted to the legal voters of the county at the ensuing election." The State Senate Interim Committee, which visited the almshouses and considered the advisability of burdening the State with a pension law, came to the conclusion that, because in the institution the "inmate is compelled against his wishes to associate with unfortunate, diseased and crippled persons, and frequently is thrown into the closest contact with persons morally derelict," the humane and satisfactory plan of relief must leave the applicant complete "discretion as to the environment he desires to live in and incidentally give him the fullest opportunity to better his condition if he can."

Wyoming and Utah have approved pension laws which make adoption mandatory upon the counties and place administration in the hands of the county commissioners. The pensionable age is 65. In Utah the maximum allowance is $25 a month. Wisconsin's law is flexible in that it permits any county to abandon the plan after a year's trial. The State pays one-third of the bill. While Kentucky and Colorado have passed old-age pension laws, they are not enforced, since none of the counties have elected to adopt them. Under the Maryland act, signed by Governor Albert Ritchie in 1927, a pension may be granted to those who have attained the age of 65.

Provisions in Other States.

The pension law is put squarely up to the counties in Montana, where the State offers neither support nor supervision. The law is in operation in most of the counties, which reported after three years that 2.6 old persons per 1,000 had sought and obtained relief.

Several States have made a brave effort and failed. In Washington a bill was passed by the Legislature and vetoed by the Governor. Arizona's law was declared unconstitutional. Pennsylvania made a gallant fight for a measure approved by Governor Pinchot, but it too was declared unconstitutional. The findings of the State's investigating committee, however, have served as a basis for other studies, and out of them grew the American Association for Old Age Security.

"It is more economical to pension a deserving pioneer than to keep him in the home," is the verdict of the Governor of Alaska, which territory, since 1915, has permitted its pioneers to choose between the homes at Sitka and Fairbanks or an allowance paid out at the discretion of the board of trustees of the Pioneers Home and taken from its fund.

Although the New York State Commission on Old Age Security has not yet completed its report, which is to be placed before the Legislature in February, a comprehensive plan for assistance has been worked out by the special committee on the care of the aged of the State Charities Aid Association. In substance the plan suggests that the State assume the financial responsibility and that the administration of relief be centred in the State Department of Social Welfare, which body, according to its recommendations, should be guided during the early stages by a State advisory board composed of members appointed by the Governor.

Stipulations relating to the beneficiary are similar to those adopted by other States, save that the age is 70 and the proposed maximum of relief is $50 a month. Basing its calculations on estimates made by the Massachusetts Commission on Pensions, the committee expressed the opinion that 41,018 persons would be eligible for assistance. The annual cost of the type of relief recommended, it is estimated, would come to $12,305,400.

More than half the population of the civilized world is covered by pension laws in some form. Thirty-eight foreign countries, including Canada, are operating under systems of state or national old age pensions or insurance plans. Two methods of handling these plans prevail abroad. By far the most popular, employed by twenty-five nations, is that which obliges the employe at least partially to insure himself. This is known as the contributory system, in that the government pays the equivalent of the amount given by the employe and in some instances by the employer.

Twelve countries have adopted the straight system of State allowances, which make no demands on the worker. Only one continues with the voluntary system. Among the countries following out the contributory system are Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Chile, Czechoslovakia, France, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Italy, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, Spain, Switzerland and Yugoslavia. The straight system has found favor in Australia, Denmark, the Irish Free State, New Zealand, Norway and Uruguay.

tonnage in one or the other of the classes referred to.

For instance, if the cruiser strength of Great Britain were to be taken as the standard tonnage, and if the tonnage in destroyers of the United States were to be taken as the standard, and the tonnage of submarines of the United States or Japan or France were to be taken as the standard, and the ratio of tonnage of other nations fixed accordingly, there would be limitation, but it would be limitation upward, not downward. It would be limitation that would add millions of dollars to construction programs of nations and millions of dollars annually for operation and maintenance.

The conference should take into consideration the factor of extending the age limit of the ships of all categories.

Saving in Replacements.

Ships do not last forever, and yet there is no definite age limit beyond which they are of no value. The age limit is largely arbitrary. A ship at twenty years is better than one of thirty, other things being equal, and yet, if all nations could agree upon a replacement age that would approach twenty-five or thirty years, immense economies could be reflected in national budgets and comparable efficiency be maintained.

Today the replacement cost of the effective ships of the United States Navy is approximately $1,200,000,000, which, upon the basis of replacement every twenty years, means an annual replacement cost of $60,000,000.

Upon the same capital investment a replacement age of thirty years would mean $40,000,000, a saving of $20,000,000 annually. This is a sizable figure, greater, in fact, than the entire cost of maintaining the foreign branch of the government service, the Department of State.

For the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1929, the United States in the regular supply bill and in supplemental measures appropriated $374,608,054 for the support of the navy. Of this amount, $46,550,000 was appropriated for new construction work and more than $328,000,000 for the ordinary expenses of the navy, including sizable figures for overhead and repair and for aircraft, all of which are more nearly akin to annual expenses than to investment.

Great Britain, Japan, France and Italy have comparable burdens to bear.

These are astonishing figures, and yet they are less than they will be for next year and annually thereafter unless we shall find a way through arrangements of nations to strike them down.

We are glibly told that because of the economic situation the United States, better than any other nation, can bear the heavy burden of a naval establishment. Granted that for the moment the United States may be in a most favored situation, that is no justification. No nation is rich enough to spend a dollar or use a human life in the name of defense when the expenditure is not needed.

At this moment the United States is headed for an annual naval burden of more than $400,000,000. Other nations have prospects that are in kind.

Last year we expended three times as much on our navy as did the German Empire in 1914. We have 300,000 tons of naval craft over and above what Germany had at the beginning of the World War, and measured by the standards of fifteen years ago, a vastly superior fleet.

The London conference can work out a formula that will cut that burden in half and that will maintain relative security. To do this it will need to write definiteness within reasonable bonds into all categories, in types, in tonnage, in numbers, in guns. It will need to strike from the lists of ships types that have had their day; it will need to extend the replacement age of all craft without disturbing relative efficiency.

The London conference may do more. Fixing definiteness in naval programs will remove in large part the element of fear among world powers and pave the way for more ready accord on the problems that threaten world relationships.

TRAVELING ART EXHIBIT VIEWED IN 500 CITIES

OFFICIALS of the Art Centre estimate that more than 500,000 persons viewed the centre's traveling exhibitions in 1929. Thirty-one exhibitions of designs, paintings, drawings, etchings, prints, photographs, posters, small sculptures and advertising art were sent to schools, colleges, museums and clubs throughout the United States. More than 500 cities and towns were reached.

Exhibitions are chosen from groups of material offered the Art Centre and first exhibited in its own galleries. Adaptability to packing and transportation is a factor in the choice. Insurance and transportation one way are paid by the museum holding the exhibition.

The first traveling exhibition was sent out from the Art Centre in January, 1927, a collection of thirty-three pieces of Irish linen and silver.

TOURISTS FROM AMERICA ARE NUMEROUS IN RUSSIA.

ABOUT two-thirds of the tourists who visited the Soviet Union in 1928-9 were Americans, according to Soviet Government figures. About 15 per cent were Britons, 8 per cent Germans and 5 per cent Spaniards. These figures do not include travelers who passed through Russia.

Business men constituted about 30 per cent of the total number, and scientists, artists, teachers, engineers and other professional men made up one-fourth.

This year travel to the Soviet Union will be encouraged, and special hunting tours are being arranged by the Soviet Intourist Company. It is expected that about 15,000 foreign tourists will visit Russia in 1930.

MIGRATORY MOTORISTS ARE STILL HEADING SOUTH

SOUTHWEST NOW DRAWS TOURISTS

New Mexico and Arizona Offer a Great Variety Of Natural Attractions and Good Roads—Highway News

By LEON A. DICKINSON.

NOT the least of the attractions of motoring to California in the Winter is the great number of interesting things to see en route, especially in New Mexico and Arizona. Many who have traveled to Southern California by railroad have no conception of the natural and archaeological wonders easily accessible to those traveling through the Southwest in a motor car.

If the trip is made at this time of year the route selected will probably be the well-known and historic Old Spanish Trail, at least in part. In that case the gateway to this Wonderland will be the Texan border city of El Paso.

Across the border is a country as different as if it were hundreds of miles away. Ciudad Juarez, the nearest Mexican city, is colorful in the extreme, with ox-carts and motor cars, peons and dons, señoritas and Federal soldiers meeting in its streets. Twelve miles from El Paso, at Ysleta, are found the last surviving members of the Pueblo tribe of Indians. There is a very old Spanish mission here. Interesting side trips may be made to old Fort Selden, the Picture Rocks and the Elephant Butte Reservoir and Dam, less than a day's drive to the northward.

About forty-five miles northwest of El Paso the tourist headed direct for Los Angeles will turn left and follow U. S. Route 80 westward through Deming to Lordsburg. At this latter place there is a junction of two main highways. U. S. 180 is the most direct route into Phoenix, but undoubtedly it is more interesting to continue on U. S. 80, even though the latter is appreciably longer. By so doing the tourist will have an opportunity to make another visit into Old Mexico from the border city of Douglas.

Those who have plenty of time may also wish to visit the Chiricahua National Monument.

Bisbee, a few miles west of Douglas, is an important mining centre. Here are located three of the largest copper mines in the country, namely, the Copper Queen, Calumet and Arizona and the Shattuck. Thousands of pounds of rich ore are shipped from here every day to the smelters at Douglas.

A Scenic Land.

From Bisbee U. S. 80 leads direct to Tucson via Tombstone and Benson, but a longer alternate is also available by way of Nogales. Those who choose the latter route will have an opportunity to visit the Tumacacori National Monument, on the road from Nogales to Tucson. This monument contains an ancient Spanish mission ruin, probably built in the early part of the seventeenth century by Jesuit priests.

The next section of the tour, from Tucson to Phoenix, likewise offers a chance to inspect still another nation monument—the Casa Grande National Monument, containing the ruins of many interesting prehistoric dwellings.

Before proceeding to Phoenix, capital of Arizona, many who motor over this highway will wish to make a side trip to the Roosevelt Dam. This is reached by turning to the right about 35 miles beyond Florence. It is one of the engineering wonders of modern times. Roosevelt Lake, formed by the dam, is not only a source of power and light for the whole Salt River Valley, but also is an attractive resort.

The city of Phoenix is surrounded by picturesque peaks and serrated ridges, including the Phoenix Mountains to the northwest, the Salt River Mountains on the south, and others to the southeast and west. Automobile roads lead to many points of interest in the vicinity, such as Granite Reef Dam, Old Fort McDowell, Camelback and Echo Canyon.

Here also is the point of divergence for the main highway (U. S. 89) leading northward to the Grand Canyon by way of Prescott and Williams. Along this latter highway is another route that branches off from Prescott and leads to Montezuma Castle National Monument.

Beyond Phoenix the main highway leads in a general westerly direction to Yuma, at the California line, and thence to El Centro. Here there is a choice of routes into San Diego, Los Angeles and the North.

To Baltimore and South.

A ROUTE to Baltimore and points south that dodges Philadelphia and Wilmington, in addition to possessing the virtues of good pavement and shortened distance, is recommended in a communication from Stephen G. Rich of Verona, N. J. Mr. Rich writes:

"I have occasion now and then to drive from hereabouts to Baltimore on business, and have had opportunity to try quite a variety of routes. I use one route to the exclusion of all others now, because it avoids an immense amount of traffic and provides good surface all the way.

"The route follows the new State road across New Jersey, paralleling the Lincoln Highway, to Trenton; then down the Camden Pike, around Camden on the Crescent Boulevard, and down through Mantua and Woodstown, taking the Penn's Grove road westward from Woodstown, until the road to Pennsville Ferry is reached, perhaps eight miles out. This road to Pennsville was paved late last Summer. I cross the ferry to New Castle, Del., and go straight ahead across the du Pont Highway to Newark, Del., and on into Rising Sun, Md. There I hit the route to Baltimore via Conowingo Dam and Belair. Recent road work has made the going from Newark, Del., to Rising Sun decidedly good most of the way; new concrete most of it.

"This route dodges Philadelphia and Wilmington entirely. Now that the new highway is open from Elizabeth to Trenton, the easiest way to get onto it is to use the old routes including the by-pass around Newark via the airport, and to get onto the Lincoln Highway as it leaves Elizabeth. At the southern end of Elizabeth the broad street, Bayway, is taken on a left turn and followed half a mile to Edgar Road, which is the new highway.

"I found no difficulty in getting an easy route through Trenton. I keep straight ahead as I come into the city by the new highway, until I reach Chambers Street, about a mile and a half in from the edge of the city. I turn left and go the whole length of this street, nearly two miles, and come out on the far end of South Broad Street, which leads into the Camden Pike.

"In getting around Camden by the Crescent Boulevard, go ahead as if going to Camden Bridge, till the circle at the end of the Bridge Boulevard is reached; then continue down on the Crescent Boulevard as for the White Horse Pike, but continue beyond the junction with the White Horse Pike. There is a short detour, well signed, of perhaps six blocks, on well-paved streets, around an unfinished bit of the Crescent Boulevard, just below the White Horse Pike, and from there on all is clear sailing into Woodbury, Mantua and Woodstown.

"I have found that the distance from here to Baltimore is nearly ten miles shorter by this route than by going through Philadelphia.

"There is another and easy way to get onto the new highway below Elizabeth. That consists in following the Lincoln Highway through Rahway, and going down the Shore Route until its intersection with the new boulevard at the "Cloverleaf Crossing." Perhaps this is easier for people not acquainted with the roads than the Bayway route."

Ice Closes Yonkers Ferry.

THE Alpine-Yonkers ferry service on the Hudson suspended operations last week on account of severe ice conditions in the river. The service is expected to resume March 1 on normal schedule from 6 A. M. until midnight daily.

FORD ADOPTS NEW ALLOY

WHEN the redesigned Model A Ford was announced late last December, the official description stated that exterior metal parts were made of rustless steel. It is now learned that the metal referred to is not the usual rustless steel, but an entirely new alloy never before used in automobiles. The Ford company's adoption of the product has more than doubled its output in this country.

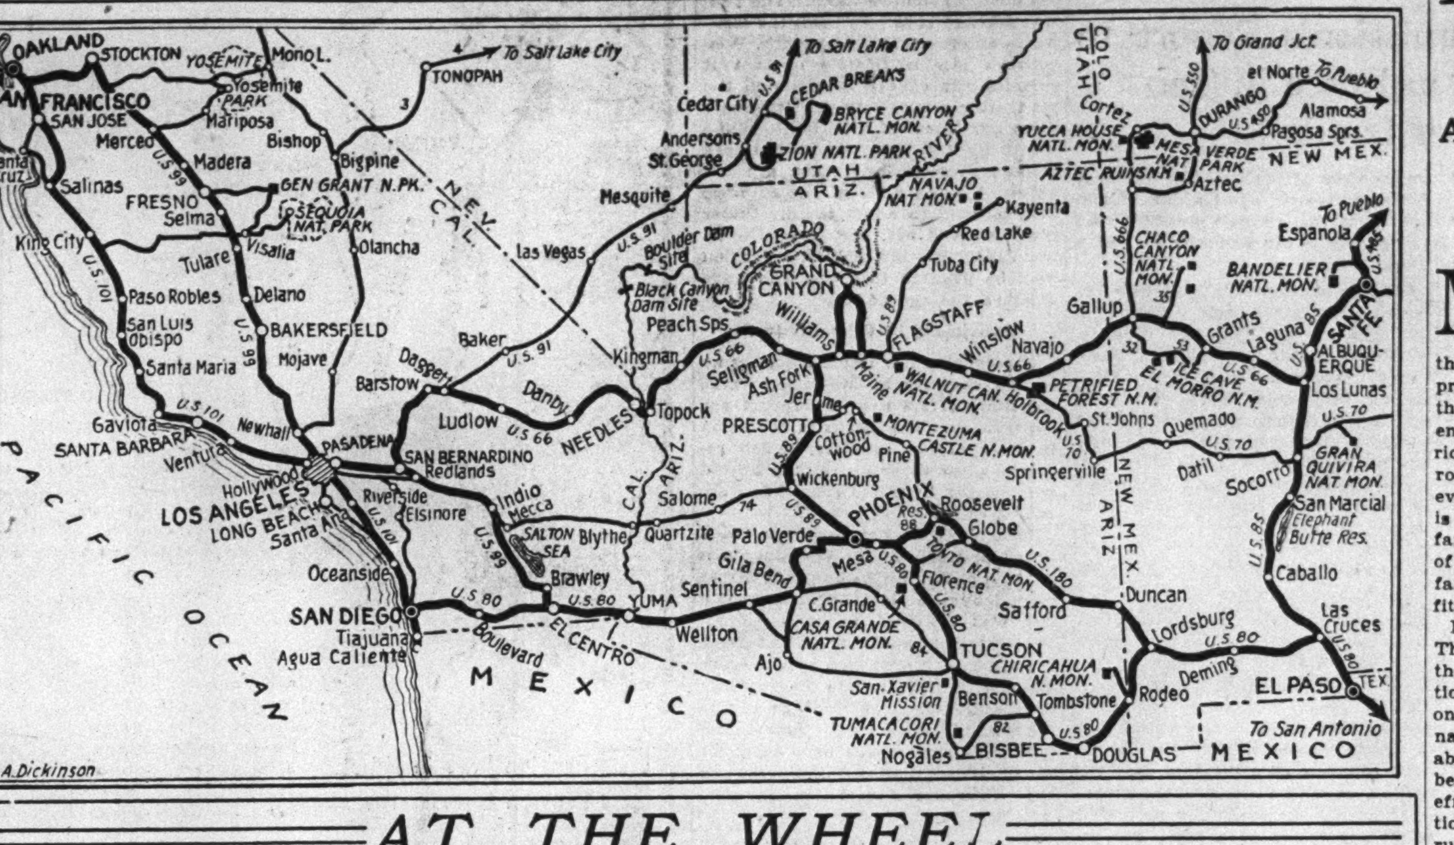
The new alloy is known as Allegheny metal. The original formula for its manufacture was developed in Germany during the war, when armament plants were seeking the hardest possible substance suitable for gun lining. At about the same time, the English also worked out the formula. It was not until after the war, however, that the commercial production of the alloy was contemplated and it was only a few years ago that methods for its economical manufacture in large tonnage were developed.

The Ford requirements are said to be about 1,000 tons a month. This represents two-thirds of the entire output of the American factories and one-third of the output of the world, which is now about 3,000 tons. When he adopted the alloy, Mr. Ford had to scrap several million dollars' worth of equipment originally installed for fabricating and polishing the nickel used in the original Model A.

Allegheny metal is said to be non-rusting, untarnishable, non-corrosive and not affected by weather in any way. It is also one of the hardest metals known to the steel industry. It is an alloy of refined steel combined with about 18 per cent of chromium, 8 per cent of nickel and smaller proportions of carbon, manganese, silicon, phosphorus and sulphur. It is the complicated method of combining these elements that gives the alloy its properties, it is explained.

Before its adoption by the Ford Company, production of the alloy was limited, because it was used only for building trim, cooking utensils, dairy equipment and other articles for which it met special requirements. It is now being considered for use in the bars of State penitentiaries, according to report, because it is so hard that it cannot be sawed or otherwise cut by any hand tool.

IN THE NEW MOTORING DISTRICT OF PREHISTORIC AMERICA



AT THE WHEEL

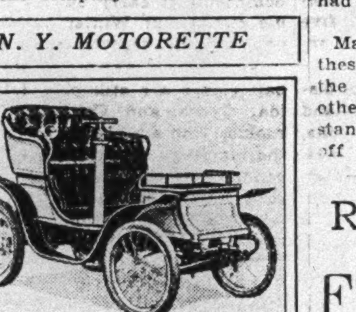
By JAMES O. SPEARING

IT was very interesting to see those old cars in last Sunday's TIMES," writes Frank S. Martyny of Hicksville, L. I., in reference to the sketches of early model automobiles printed in the annual motor car section of this newspaper on Jan. 5. Mr. Martyny was interested because he has a car that probably antedates many of those represented.

"In 1902 on Nov. 17," he says, "Augieres drove a Mors automobile at Dourdan seventy-eight miles an hour. After she came to New York I bought her and took the motor out—it has four cylinders and I think it was the first four-cylinder motor built up to that time—and put it in my De Dion car. It is in good condition now. The car was built in 1902 in Brooklyn."

Mr. Martyny enclosed a catalogue of the "Motorettes" once built by the De Dion-Bouton Motorette Company of Brooklyn. The catalogue, which is dated May, 1901, shows that the company's line of cars included more than ten models adapted from the more popular horse-drawn vehicles of the day. The "New York Type Motorette," for instance, was a single-seat buggy described in the catalogue as follows:

N. Y. MOTORETTE



Motor, 3½ horsepower; seating capacity, two persons; weight, 675 pounds; wheels, 28 inches in diameter; tires, 2½-inch single, or 3-inch double, tube; gasoline capacity, two gallons; water capacity, two gallons; speed, up to twenty miles an hour; price, $1,100; with top, $1,200.

There is also a hansom cab in the catalogue, which, in outward appearance, virtually duplicates those still seen in Central Park. Another offering is a "Doctor's Motorette," capable of seating four persons, with two of them on a front seat facing the driver. Both these cars were driven by motors of five horsepower, and the doctor's vehicle could attain a speed "up to twenty-five miles an hour." It was recognized, apparently, that doctors must hurry sometimes. For ordinary purposes, however, no such racing was considered necessary, for the maximum speed of the hansom cab was eighteen miles an hour. This vehicle was one of the most expensive made by the company, its price being $2,500. A "Doctor's Brougham with Rumble," equipped with a five-horsepower motor, was also limited to eighteen miles an hour, possibly because of the wind resistance offered by the high, flat front.

THE HANSOM CAB

The De Dion-Bouton Company now belongs to the history of the automobile. It was one of the firms with which the evolution of the motor car began, but, once started, evolution probably went too fast for the company. When one compares its models with this year's cars, they look like the antiques of some prehistoric past. Yet they were on the roads less than thirty years ago—and Mr. Martyny's 1902 motorette is "in good condition now."

This, at least, is more than can be said for many of the 812 modern automobiles involved in accidents on Westchester County's parkways last year. These Westchester parkways are of the "super-highway" type. For the most part they are wide and smooth, without grade intersections. When a motorist enters one of them he has nothing to do but drive. One might suppose that he would have to make special and extra effort to find an accident for himself. The question naturally arises therefore: how did the 812 accidents occur?

Collisions between cars accounted for 615 of the mishaps, sixty-one drivers ran off the pavement, forty-eight collided with fences and guard rails, thirty-five hit trees, twenty-six tried to knock down poles and several more were halted by bridges, barricades and caution signs. Four drivers obediently came to a standstill at "Full Stop" signs after they had run into the signs.

Many of the persons involved in these accidents were undoubtedly the victims of the recklessness of others. It can be imagined, for instance, that some of those who ran off the pavement merely declined invitations to collisions offered by more sociable drivers. A number of those caught in collision were probably unable to escape. It seems fair to say, however, that at least half the drivers involved in the 812 parkway accidents were flagrantly at fault. In every accident somebody was to blame. This means that if every motorist who used the parkways last year had driven competently, there would have been no accidents at all.

And that's the cause of most of the accidents in the United States—simply incompetent driving. There are too many bad drivers on the roads. Most of them consider themselves masters at the wheel, but their mastery consists in readiness to take a chance. They drive cars in the mood and manner of a nervy gambler playing poker or shooting craps. The gambler will often follow a "hunch" rather than judgment in drawing to his hand. He will pyramid his winnings at dice in disregard of discretion's advice. Likewise, he will drive his automobile much faster than conditions justify, and he'll turn out of line to pass another car when there isn't sufficient room.

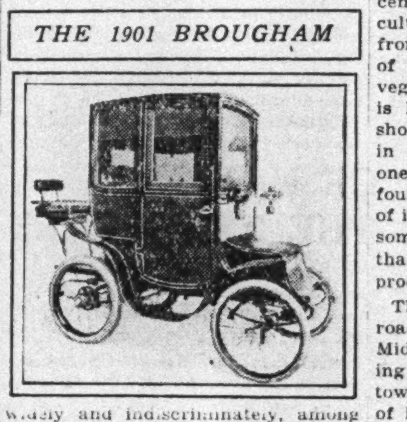
When one considers the difference in consequences between taking a chance at a gambling table and taking a chance on the highway he may protest that only an uncalculating child would handle a pair of dice and the wheel of an automobile in the same manner and mood. That's right. Reckless drivers are children at the wheel. They may be adults in other occupations of life, but they haven't grown up to the automobile. So far as driving is concerned, they lack the competence that comes with mental maturity. They are as unadapted to the machine in their hands as is the small boy who points an "unloaded" gun at a friend.

DOCTOR'S MOTORETTE

The reckless driver is not yet an eradicable menace, however. He is inevitable. In 1902, when Mr. Martyny bought his Motorette, only 9,000 automobiles were made in the whole United States. There probably weren't more than 20,000 on all the roads and their normal speed was about twenty-five miles an hour. There are more than 26,000,000 automobiles on the roads today and sixty miles an hour is usual.

In less than thirty years, therefore, the motor car has been distributed widely and indiscriminately, among the human race. The human race was not ready for it when it came, of course. Is it any wonder that it is not universally ready for it yet? Adaptation takes time. Some day all those who drive automobiles will be competent to handle them. Until then the mentally mature motorist must watch out for the children of the road—and laws, plus education, can be used to hurry adaptation along.

THE 1901 BROUGHAM



REPORTED BY THE INDUSTRY

FOLLOWING the development of a substance and device said to eliminate carbon monoxide from engine exhausts, recently announced by Dr. J. C. W. Frazer, Professor of Chemistry at Johns Hopkins University, the formation of the Carbon Monoxide Eliminator Corporation as sole licensee of the product is announced by J. H. Newmark, its president.

In Dr. Frazer's discovery a chemical catalyst is used which changes the deadly monoxide gas into carbon dioxide, which is harmless. In addition, it is claimed, this device removes odor, smoke and fumes from gas-engine exhausts.

The company, formed to carry out the commercial development and application of this discovery, has established offices in New York and Pittsburgh, according to Mr. Newmark. Other officers are John T. Ryan, vice president; George H. Deike, treasurer, and E. H. Kellogg, secretary, all of Pittsburgh. Mr. Newmark has long been associated with the automotive industry.

Paige Commercial Cars.

THE Paige commercial cars recently announced by the Graham-Paige Motors Corporation are being produced in two body types, screen and panel, on a chassis of 115 inches with a six-cylinder engine developing 76 horsepower.

The new units are rated at 1,500 pounds load capacity, and embody the engineering features of the Graham passenger cars, the chassis being similar to the 1929 model 615, except for the use of a three-speed transmission. The Paige cars will be equipped with non-shatterable glass in windshields and windows.

Several features for greater convenience are incorporated. The interior of the body is lined with steel panels, covering all projections that might cause trouble in loading and unloading, and the seat at the right of the driver has been omitted to make room for long loads. The driver's seat is adjustable, as are the clutch and brake pedals. The exhaust pipe discharges at the left side instead of at the rear, to prevent fumes from being drawn into the body by the back draft when the car is in motion, or causing discomfort to the loaders when the car is standing still.

Fordson Tractors.

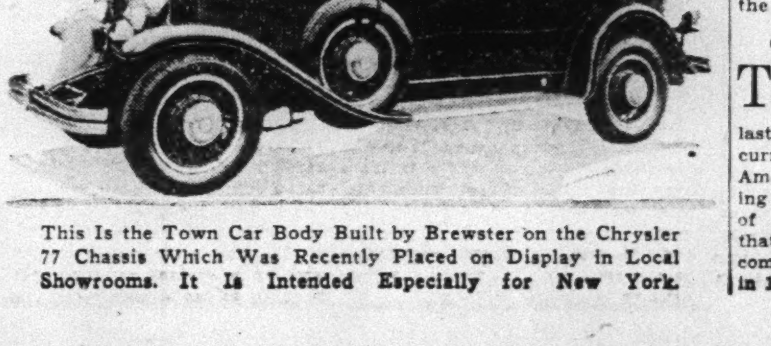
AN improved Fordson tractor, with 27.5 per cent greater horsepower than former models, is announced in a cablegram to the Ford Motor Company from Sir Percival Perry, chairman of the board of the Ford Motor Company, Ltd., of London, under whose supervision the Fordson is now built at Cork, Ireland. The new tractor is said to develop thirty horsepower at 1,000 revolutions per minute, or 2¾ miles per hour plowing speed. Easier starting is provided by a new high-tension magneto. The cooling system has been improved by the addition of a pump. Other improvements are an enlarged air washer, new lubricating system, stronger crankshaft and redesigned transmission.

The Chevrolet Motor Company reports that in response to demand for its new car it has had to revise production schedules upward and expects to sell more cars this month than in January a year ago.

Cannonball Baker, driving a stock Franklin sedan, recently set a new record by covering the 1,451 miles between New York and Miami in 24 hours 20 minutes, clipping 5 hours and one minute off the previous record, according to company officials.

Thomas E. Jarrard, Marmon general sales director, announces the promotion of John Tainsh to assistant general sales director and of George C. Tenney to succeed him as sales manager.

THE CHRYSLER TOWN CAR



This Is the Town Car Body Built by Brewster on the Chrysler 77 Chassis Which Was Recently Placed on Display in Local Showrooms. It Is Intended Especially for New York.

KILBOURN IS APPOINTED DE SOTO DEALER HERE

THE De Soto Motor Corporation announces the appointment of Kilbourn Motor Sales, Inc., as dealers for New York City and Long Island. The new organization, headed by Orrin P. Kilbourn, is temporarily situated at 1,757 Broadway, where the new De Soto eight and six models are on display. Service and parts departments have been opened at 125 West End Avenue.

In taking over the De Soto dealership, Mr. Kilbourn is returning to the automobile field, which he left originally to become a Captain in the Twenty-first Field Artillery during the war. After the war he became assistant sales manager of the Willys-Overland Company and later joined the staff of the J. Walter Thompson Company, advertisers. It is from this concern that he goes to the De Soto organization.

CAR PRICES GOING UP.

THIS year American automobile buyers will pay a little more for their cars, on an average, than last year, according to an analysis of current retail prices made by the American Motorists Association. Using f. o. b. factory prices as a basis of comparison, the survey shows that the 1929 average price was $687, compared with $673 in 1928 and $733 in 1927.

FARMERS DEMAND BETTER HIGHWAYS

All-Year Roads Necessary If Agricultural Products Are to Be Delivered to Meet Market Requirements

By O. A. FITZGERALD.

MORE and more farmers are realizing that agricultural districts are paying for good roads whether they have them or not. Twenty years ago the prevailing idea in rural districts was that good roads were a luxury to be enjoyed only by the chosen few in rich, thickly settled areas. Today good roads are regarded as a necessity everywhere. Nationwide, therefore, is the call for better rural thoroughfares to aid in the orderly marketing of farm produce, and to extend to the farm family the all-year social benefits that accompany good roads.

In a recent address, Sam H. Thompson of Illinois, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, called attention to the fact that only 5 per cent of the farms of the nation are on 365-day roads. The absence of good roads has a direct bearing on market gluts and inefficient marketing. Farmers in sections with poor roads are forced to rush to market while their dirt roads are passable.

Rural fires in 1928, says the American Farm Bureau Federation, resulted in losses of $150,000,000 and 3,000 lives. Modern fire-fighting equipment is of little value without good roads, especially as many of the fires occur in Winter.

Rural children go to school in increasing numbers by motor bus. Approximately 360,900,000 children were conveyed to school last year. Motor transportation has assisted greatly in improving the standards of rural education. Consolidation of many "little red school houses" has been possible, giving the larger districts schools comparing favorably with those in the cities. But this requires year-round roads.

The fruits already reaped from highway construction in farming districts only serve to indicate what the reward will be when the rural road problem is tackled on a broader scale. When Congress was holding hearings on the Federal aid highway bill Representative Almon of Alabama urged that $50,000,000 be added each year to Federal aid funds as a means of extending aid to agriculture. Another Congressman proposed a special fund of $50,000,000 a year to be apportioned among the States for use on exclusively farm-to-market roads. These sentiments in Congress suggest that the relation of good roads to a profitable agriculture is becoming widely recognized.

Getting to Market.

Roads figure somewhere in the marketing of all agricultural produce. The farmer served by good roads gets his produce to market quicker, in better condition and at less cost.

The marked increase in the use of motor trucks for hauling farm produce direct to markets is shown in a survey in New York City made recently by the Department of Agriculture. This study brought out that from 20 to 30 per cent of the supply of leading home-grown fruits and vegetables on the New York market is hauled in by truck. The survey showed that for about three months in mid-season New York City gets one-third of its peach supply, one-fourth of its tomatoes and one-fifth of its apples by motor truck and that sometimes during the season more than one-half of the New Jersey produce supply moves in trucks.

The need for more and better rural roads, however, is greatest in the Middle West, West and South. During the rainy season two years ago a town in Washington broadcast a plea of hard times. Rains had made the dirt roads impassable. Farmers near by were unable to truck their produce to market. Little money was coming in. Business houses felt the effects of the muddy roads. All this community asked in the way of relief was roads that could be used during rainy weather.

Maricopa County, Arizona, presents a striking study in the value of good roads to agricultural and general business in a rural district. That county built a few years ago about 330 miles of concrete roads and estimates that they are paying dividends on every dollar invested. A creamery company hauled 30 per cent more products at 25 per cent less cost after the new roads came. A storage and distributing company reduced its hauling costs 33 per cent, passing this saving on to the patrons by reducing its charges one-third. A farmer found his smallest draft team could pull 7,500 pounds on the new surfaced roads whereas before 4,000 pounds was the limit. The life of this farmer's automobile tires jumped from 3,500 miles on the dirt roads to 15,000 miles on the concrete. A live stock feeding company reduced the hauling charges on the large quantities of grain it required from 20 cents to 10 cents per ton mile.

The economic benefits of good roads usually are advanced first, but there are social benefits of great importance. In fact, W. M. Jardine, former Secretary of Agriculture, once said: "The social benefits of better roads to the farm are perhaps even greater than the economic benefits. Good roads lessen the isolation of farmers and make the farms better places on which to live."

Isolated Farmers.

The farmer used to be pictured as a rather contented isolationist, perfectly willing to stay at home and do the chores. His reaction to modern motor transportation, however, proves that isolation was not his choice. Scores of farm families who enjoy fine motorways over which they can travel forty miles an hour, covering 200 or more miles a day, recall the time, not so far removed, when ten miles was regarded a long distance from home and forty miles was an exceptionally good day's travel.

Development of rural roads has been accompanied by the rise in roadside markets in which farmers sell produce direct to motorists. The American Automobile Association believes that roadside markets of the nation do a business in excess of $100,000,000 a year. A representative of the University of New Hampshire Experiment Station recently made a study of roadside marketing. He found 791 roadside markets on 1,000 miles of highway. A detailed estimate was obtained on the business volume done by 103 of them. Five reported sales in excess of $10,000 a year, seven exceeded $5,000, six ranged between $4,000 and $5,000, twelve reported sales between $3,000 and $4,000 and seventeen ranged between $2,000 and $3,000.

In the Middle West, South and Far West much thought is being applied to the matter of rural roads. In most States it is chiefly a matter of obtaining money. The States could make good use of more miles of fine roads, but the question is: Who is going to pay for them? Several States have voted bond issues to extend their road systems to rural districts. Others are considering this matter. A road traffic survey is now being conducted in eleven Western States by the Federal Bureau of Public Roads in cooperation with the State Highway Departments. This survey will supply data that will be used in formulating future highway programs designed to serve all interests.

BUSES IN NEW JERSEY

THE growth of motor bus travel during 1929 in New Jersey is shown in a recent survey conducted by the Street Transportation Department of the Board of Public Utility Commissioners. The survey indicates that there are now approximately 423 intrastate bus routes over which approximately 3,330 buses operate in daily service. In addition to the intrastate bus lines there are approximately 1,250 buses used on interstate routes either terminating in or passing through New Jersey.

Leo F. Conlon, senior inspector of traffic, Board of Public Utility Commissioners, says that practically every important highway in the State is covered by motor bus routes extending in a vast network from Sussex County to Cape May.

"During the year 1929," said Mr. Conlon, "many motor bus lines took the place of single-track street railway crosstown lines in the larger municipalities, and in many cases buses supplanted trolleys in suburban districts. In Paterson, one of the largest cities in New Jersey, the street railway service on the local lines was superseded by bus operation.

"The parking problem in many of the larger municipalities has caused bus operators to see the necessity for bus terminals. Equipped with waiting rooms, ticket offices, information bureaus, &c., terminals have been established in many cities. Public Service Coordinated Transport recently equipped the upper level of the Terminal Building at Newark with a first-class motor bus terminal. Practically all the long-distance and interurban bus lines are now operating to and from this terminal.

"The desire of the public to travel by motor coach has been recognized by the large railroad companies. The Central Railroad of New Jersey, the Baltimore & Ohio, and the Reading, directly or through subsidiaries, are now operating buses in both interstate and intrastate service.

"From a survey of the situation in New Jersey it appears that the intrastate bus operation has grown and is continuing to develop through constructive regulation.

"Interstate operation, especially between Camden and Philadelphia, as well as between New York, Jersey City and Newark, is highly competitive, because of the fact that there is no regulation of this service. The Board of Public Utility Commissioners of New Jersey has only limited jurisdiction over interstate bus operators. It has no jurisdiction or regulation over the rates of fare, service, number of buses to be operated, &c. In the absence of regulation the competition in many cases has become so keen that it has brought about financial losses, and, in many cases, cessation of service. The operation of interstate motor buses can be placed on a sound financial basis, and can be developed along more economic lines, if some form of Federal control and regulation is adopted. The regulation of interstate motor carriers appears to be a necessity at this time, in so far as it affects New Jersey, at any rate."

HOMELESS MEN MAKE UP UNIQUE BOWERY PROBLEM

Thousands Are Drawn Into a Hand-to-Mouth Existence Annually From All Parts of the World—The Task of Constructive Relief and Its Difficulties

By ELMER GALLOWAY,
Executive Secretary of the Bowery Y. M. C. A.

EVERY one who has walked from Cooper Union to Chatham Square and Chinatown and on to Park Row—every one who has been on the Bowery at all—is familiar with the sight of men who make this world-famous street their home. Tramps, bums, hoboes, some people call them. "Down and outers;" others say. "Migratory workers" is the economist's classification for many of them. They are vagrants in the eyes of the law. To the social worker they are "homeless men."

It is estimated that some 15,000 men drift into the Bowery district in the midwinter season. The street is lined with commercial lodging houses and with missions. The men fill these places at night; in the daytime they roam the city. Some, with a reasonable amount of assistance, are capable of rehabilitation. Others come to New York to be housed and fed during the Winter.

What is offered these men varies from the benefits of well-planned social service to something that almost amounts to exploitation of them for the benefit of sight-seers and slumming parties. Some of the organizations devoting themselves to the men in the Bowery do not discriminate between the persons who apply, accepting any one who comes. Some of these places are not equipped to care for lodgers, who sleep on benches or on the floor. There is no form of registry or record-keeping in many of the missions.

In marked contrast are the methods followed by the agencies seeking to do constructive work with these men—such agencies as the Bowery Y. M. C. A., the Jewish Social Service Association and the Salvation Army. These organizations seek to understand and diagnose each man's situation and to provide him with such opportunities as he needs to overcome his particular handicaps.

Men From All the World.

Most of the men on the Bowery are not native New Yorkers. It is difficult to get reliable statistics about this part of New York's population because it is constantly changing and shifting. Some interesting things about them, however, are disclosed by the records of the Bowery Y. M. C. A.

Of a total of 2,882 men who came to the Bowery Y. M. C. A. for help in 1928, only 204—less than eight out of every 100—were born in New York. More than 25 per cent of the men came from near-by States—nearly 20 per cent from New England—while 23 per cent had been born abroad. Of the foreign-born nearly 45 per cent were from the British Isles, about 15 per cent from Canada, about 20 per cent from Northern Europe and 12 per cent from Eastern Europe. There are also on the Bowery a few South Europeans, Australians, Asiatics and Latin Americans.

Education Along the Bowery.

The men on the Bowery are by no means illiterate or even uneducated. Of the men studied by the Y. M. C. A. in 1928 5 per cent had attended college and 30 per cent had attended high school. About 54 per cent got as far as the sixth or eighth grade, 11 per cent had less than a sixth-grade education and only one man of more than 2,000 said he had never attended school.

Of this group 53 per cent were Protestants, of whom 18 per cent said they were church members, 43 per cent were Catholics and less than 3 per cent were Jewish. About 87 per cent of them claimed to be citizens. Only 5 per cent of the men were more than 50 years of age; more than 56 per cent were 30 or younger.

The men on the Bowery are not criminals, gangsters or gunmen. They are, instead, a crushed and broken lot of human beings who have repeatedly failed in their struggle for existence and who lack sufficient will power to carry on their efforts for independence and self-dependence. They have not energy enough to be dangerous; they are not smart enough to be crooks.

Most of them are men who have not succeeded in getting jobs or in keeping them, in making money or in saving it. There are two main classifications into which they may be divided—those anxious or at least willing to get a job, to work and to make good, and those who want to live on the bounty of others without working. Neither of these groups, however, includes the "migratory worker." He is one of many who drift about the country, working as they go, at harvesting, logging or ice cutting, according to the season. He works three months or so, saves his money and drifts into New York.

The men willing to work make up a majority of those who come to the Bowery Y. M. C. A. for help. It is a constructive program that the Y. M. C. A. offers—food, bed, bath, clean clothes, car fare and jobs—all on credit to the man without money. Rates are minimum, but the man must pay his way as soon as he receives his first pay check. The detailed record kept by the Bowery "Y," including interviews with the men before and after their "Y" experience, and letters from former residents or clients of the "Y," show the success of this method—the real rehabilitation that takes place in the men who are willing to work according to the Y. M. C. A. plan.

But the other men—the thousands who do not want to work—what happens to them? At the time that former Health Commissioner Harris placed restrictions on the number of men allowed to sleep in the Bowery missions and "flop-houses," 400 of the men who were turned out of the missions were sent to the Bowery Y. M. C. A. They were there told of the constructive program offered by the Y. M. C. A., but of the 400 only four accepted the plan and two of these abandoned it, presumably to revert with the other 396 to the bread-lines and the missions, where nothing was expected of them in return for free food and free lodging.

Those Who Will Not Work.

The inference is that these men do not want work—that they are content to live any way they can as long as they do not have to work. And they do not have to work at all if they do not want to, because the free missions, along with the Municipal Lodging House, which gives five nights of shelter every month to resident New Yorkers and one night a year to out-of-towners, enable them to move about from one to the other, getting free food, free beds and free baths day after day, week after week and month after month.

There are about 10,000 beds in the lodging houses along the Bowery. These are largely occupied, however, by men who can and do pay the cheap rates demanded. But there are on the Bowery at almost any time about 2,000 men who are homeless and destitute—men who are socially inadequate, mentally sick, incapable of dealing with life, and in many cases habitual mendicants. These men present one of the most difficult problems of organized society and organized charity.

The Bowery Y. M. C. A. seeks to study and classify the men who apply in an effort to find out what needs to be done for each and then to help him do it. Other social agencies doing constructive work include the Transient Service Bureau of the Salvation Army, which tries by means of individual case work methods wherever possible to return to their legal residences the men who come to them for help. There is also the American Red Cross, which cares for World War veterans.

The Brace Memorial Newsboys' House assists more than 2,000 boys yearly and has accommodations for 125 boys. St. Barnabas' House takes care of homeless women. The Jewish Social Service Association holds itself responsible for all cases of needy men of the Jewish faith, detached from a family group, whether or not they be legally domiciled in New York. Homeless Jewish men are lodged at the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society or at other public shelters and are given financial aid to help them in the preliminary period of their adjustment.

The Joint Application Bureau of the Charity Organization Society and the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor at 105 East Twenty-second Street, which is open until midnight, directs the homeless man or boy to agencies that provide food and shelter and tries to find work for such unfortunates. The Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society has a cooperative program for handling the homeless of all the Protestant Episcopal churches. The Municipal Lodging House, with accommodations for about 800, is maintained by the Department of Public Welfare.

The first step in handling the problem of the homeless man is to study and classify these men in order to determine their individual needs and capacities. Many should be sent to institutions—the sick to hospitals, the mentally unfit to clinics and homes where they can be properly cared for.

The next step should be the setting up of a clearing-house to avoid duplication of effort. This has been partly accomplished by the organization of the Lower East Side Community Council, which has in its membership representatives from nearly all the relief agencies on the Bowery. The Committee on the Homeless, which is part of this organization, seeks to clear the names of all men handled by the different organizations. It tries to find out how many of these men have been handled by other organizations and refers them back to the organizations that are familiar with their cases or to organizations better equipped to handle their particular problems.

This cooperation has to some extent eliminated duplication of work. But a great deal still remains to be done in working out a scientific program. The entire field needs to be studied and the work of each interested organization defined. The rescue missions should join forces and cooperate with the other agencies in the field.

Detroit, Cleveland and Chicago have organizations that do work similar to that of the Bowery Y. M. C. A. The effort to solve the problem of the homeless man, when considered from a national point of view, is practically negligible. When a real technique for dealing with the homeless man is developed, comparable to the case-work method now being so successfully used with the family in difficulties, a great step forward will have been taken.

Some progress in this direction has already been made in this city. The Research Bureau of the Welfare Council has for some time been making a scientific study of homeless men. The findings of this study should make the problem more understandable, not only to the public and private welfare agencies working with these men, but—what is perhaps more important—to the public at large. Another step already undertaken is the coordination of the activities of all agencies working with and for the homeless, through the Welfare Council and the Lower East Side Community Council.

Finally, there is some hope among these agencies that before long a comprehensive program for the rehabilitation of the homeless man will be developed as the joint project of the principal agencies in this field.

LINDSAY'S TASK AS ENVOY

Britain's Ambassador Comes to Interpret London's Views

By KATHLEEN WOODWARD.

LONDON.

WHAT does Great Britain expect of Sir Ronald Lindsay, his Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary who will succeed Sir Esme Howard at Washington? She expects all that she demands from every Ambassador to whom she entrusts her representation in a foreign country—and a great deal more besides.

In two ways the circumstances are such as to make the appointment of Sir Ronald Lindsay of more than ordinary significance and importance. It is the first time that the Labor Government has sent an envoy to the United States; and he is sent at a time when issues have arisen affecting more than the future of America and Britain—such issues, for example, as are involved in the two great questions of disarmament and international peace.

The appointment of Sir Ronald Lindsay follows the unusual visit to America of Premier MacDonald, which so clearly sounded the dominant note of his government's foreign policy and proclaimed to the world the great importance that the British people attach to continuing good relations between them and the United States. This should sufficiently indicate why, in England, the appointment is regarded as exceptional, the occasion unique, and the opportunities before the new Ambassador far-reaching and unprecedented.

Ambassador Who Looks the Part.

So far as appearances go, Sir Ronald looks the part of an important Ambassador. He is tall—he stands 6 foot 4; he has well-cut, strong features and dark hair. In his easy bearing it is not apparent that he is shy; but that this is so is the evidence of his closest friends. To hear him laugh is to know why his associates speak of him with much enthusiasm; and altogether the personal charm of this quiet, self-contained Scotsman is most agreeable. It must have contributed not a little to the success of his diplomatic career, which began thirty years ago and raised him at the age of 51 to the head of the Foreign Office. It is rare that so young a man attains this responsible post.

The experiences which Sir Ronald has crowded into his life have left him not much time for the cultivation of those casual pursuits usually associated with men of his rank. He reads a good deal; like Mr. MacDonald he is a great walker; and early in his diplomatic career he attained a proficiency in Oriental languages. For the most part, his life has been spent outside the study and the hunting field in crowded embassies and in the observation of men and affairs.

The appointment of Sir Ronald is certainly endorsed by personal impressions of him; but it is to be assumed that Mr. MacDonald was influenced by other considerations than the good looks and charm of his new Ambassador. There was, of course, the circumstance of his unusually full knowledge of foreign affairs. He has been Ambassador in two important European capitals; he has seen extensive service in St. Petersburg, Teheran, Washington, Egypt, Turkey, Berlin, Paris and the legation at The Hague. His experience is immense; but he was not chosen because of his experience alone.

It is no secret that Mr. MacDonald did not find it easy to choose a man for Washington within the narrow ambit of the trained diplomatic service, and that he was unwilling to go outside the service and risk the choice of a brilliant amateur.

Sir Ronald Lindsay was selected, first, because it was essential that the Ambassador should have a profound and sympathetic understanding of America. Evidently, Mr. MacDonald was satisfied that he had discovered this quality in Sir Ronald, who, it is known, is linked to America with many ties of relationship, through his marriage. Secondly, it was imperative that he should be able to interpret to Washington the aspirations as well as the attitude of the Labor Government, which, especially in foreign affairs, inevitably differs from the traditions of other and older political parties in this country.

It may be said that Labor's position with regard to foreign affairs more nearly resembles the position of America than that of the older parties in England. The United States has in the main been free from the complications which have arisen on the Continent of Europe. Until 1924, with its advent to power, the Labor party was innocent alike of any experience of foreign questions and of interest or ambitions toward them. Its concerns were wholly domestic, relating mainly to questions of trade and industry. These questions it approached by the methods of frank discussion and a full statement of their difficulties, aims and objects.

Thrown into power in 1924, owing to the political exigencies of the other parties, Labor had for the first time to shoulder responsibility for the foreign policy of this country, wholly untrammeled by tradition and precedent, unaided by the centuries of diplomatic experience which was the inheritance of the other parties. Naturally Labor applied to foreign problems the only methods it knew and had tried with success in other spheres.

Inevitably the party leaders encountered the resistance of traditional methods and of professional cliques, and that most select and highly trained body, the corps diplomatique. Adjustments had to be made; time was necessary. At the end of nine months Labor went out of office sobered by responsibilities and having implanted new ideas in the traditional diplomatic body—leaving them to ferment. During the last five years no person in this country could have imagined that a second Labor Government was outside the bounds of reasonable possibility; neither could such a contingency have escaped the acute minds of the permanent diplomats at the Foreign Office. Labor has now returned to power with a new body of experience and a resolution to break free from many fetters of the past.

It is expected of Sir Ronald Lindsay that he will interpret to America the new outlook on foreign affairs in England. His experience and sympathetic understanding warrant almost extravagant hopes, and it may be one of his duties to make even more clear to the American people what Mr. MacDonald has already pointed out in more than one speech, the curious and, in some respects, regrettable halo of romance with which the Englishman surrounds his navy.

TWO HUNDRED UNDERSTAND EINSTEIN NOW, IT IS SAID

Crowd at Film Explaining His Theory Called No Index of Popular Knowledge

DESPITE the crowd of 4,500 persons which crashed the gate last week at a meeting of the Amateur Astronomers Association to see a motion picture explaining the Einstein theory of relativity, professors of mathematics are disinclined to believe that there is a growing interest in and popular understanding of the work of the German scientist. In learned circles, they say, the more revolutionary quantum theory of physics is the more absorbing.

Several instructors at Columbia University thought the peak of Einstein's popularity was reached five years ago. The opinion was expressed that last week's crowd was composed largely of laymen who, discouraged at trying to understand relativity from a reading of books, magazines and newspaper articles, went to the free movie at the American Museum of Natural History hoping to get an inkling of what it is all about.

As a subject of conversation some said that Einstein is gaining ground, though specialists disagreed on this point. They agreed, however, that real knowledge about his theories is still confined to a handful of scholars. One New York professor thought the group of men who, it was generally conceded a few years ago, understood the difficult formulas, had now increased from twelve to a possible 200. These 200, he added, were specialists, usually instructors in large universities.

The average person, according to this scholar, could perhaps get a clearer idea of Einstein from movies than he could from books. But without long and arduous study, it was affirmed, even the highly educated would always remain ignorant on the subject of Einstein's teachings.

The Field Theory.

Not one person in a million, said this man, understood Einstein's "New Field Theory," which was announced in January of last year. For most people the paper was merely a series of letters, dashes, figures and dots. However, the publication of so complicated and technical a treatise in American newspapers was considered an achievement in journalism, especially as it had been transmitted by cable. Scholars all over the country, he said, acknowledged it to be of high interest and scientific importance.

For more than a decade battles have raged over Einstein's theories. Mathematicians, physicists and astronomers have gone into the arena armed with scientific bombs warranted to blow up this and that theory evolved by the German scholar. As one mathematician put it, things today make for sudden jumps in science as well as in other fields. In technical parlance, "the continuous is giving way to the discontinuous." Science is becoming revolutionary.

The original presentation of Einstein's theory of relativity filled three pages. Those first three pages have been followed by more than 3,700 books written by French, Italian, Dutch, German, English and American scientists. Some of the volumes support, others attempt to refute, the theory that still makes headlines. While the exact number of books on Einstein and his work is obtainable, no statistician has attempted to count the number of newspaper and magazine articles that have appeared to challenge Einstein's original formula or his later theory unifying gravity and electricity.

Professors say it takes ten years of hard study for a student to understand Einstein, and the student must be a university graduate with a three-year post-graduate course to his credit. Einstein's new geometry is but one stumbling-block to the ambitious student courageously embarking on the seventeen-year course.

BASEBALL LIVES EVEN IN WINTER

Played Only in Mild Climes, It Nevertheless Is Talked by the Fans and Players Carry the Game Into Their Winter Pursuits

FROM Spring training in March to the world's series in October King Baseball rules the sport world, and though the fan turns his attention to football, basketball hockey and various other cold-weather sports, America's national pastime refuses to take a back seat. Those connected with baseball are not pushed into complete obscurity and rebel against terminating their connection with the sport.

Baseball has its famous "hot-stove league" that meets throughout the wintry months. Though it is pictured as a group of male citizens seated around a tiny stove centrally situated in the general store of Oshkosh, Wis., there really are similar groups of fans discussing trades and future prospects in the lobbies of New York hotels and on the crowded Broadway corners.

The "hot-stove league" is constantly talking baseball, revisioning the last season and prophesying for the next. Relative merits of ball players are discussed; the recent world series is played over to the last detail; breaks of the game are analyzed; clever headwork and inside baseball strategy are extolled; averages are computed and records quoted. The real fan displays unusual ardor and zeal in his arguments and is always ready to back up his statements with statistics, no mattre what the season of the year.

Many have wondered whether baseball is really dead in Winter, what the players, managers and umpires do and whether the game is played at all. To these queries it can readily be answered that baseball is alive. The players engage in various activities, as do the umpires, some barnstorming, some engaging in active business, some heading small enterprises and some just vacationing. In many places where the climate permits the game is still played.

Baseball in Other Lands.

Several big leaguers journey to foreign lands to help in the spread of the game and to instil spirit in the novices. Last Winter Ty Cobb spent in instructing a class of 4,000 at the Waseda University in Japan, aided in the work by Bob Shawkey and Umpire Ernie Quigley. Winter practices held in Oriental countries prepare several budding stars to come West and join minor league teams in the United States. Africa has a league known as the "Ligue Tunisienne de Baseball." The teams composing it carry out their schedule during our Winter months and, according to reports, show spirited interest in the game. In midwinter ball games are still played in Florida, Texas and California, where rookies who are slated to go up into the big leagues next season keep in condition so that they may be physically fit to start the Spring practice with the major league ball teams.

Immediately after the world series in the early part of October most ball players take a short vacation before starting their Winter work. Barnstorming is their favorite way to make some extra money and the league heads have ruled that this type of exhibition be permitted till Oct. 31. Usually outstanding players get together and form two teams.

Baseball is less discussed at the end of October than at any other time during the year; for world series post-mortems usually run out in the middle of the month, and fans as well as players sit back and rest. But with the coming of November the more ambitious players and others connected with the game start on their Winter activities, which include many different occupations.

Mickey Cochrane, recently acclaimed the most valuable player in the big leagues, plays his saxophone in a vaudeville act. Babe Ruth, Lefty Clark and Del Bissonette revel in hunting game in the Maine woods. Ruth is also a lover of golf and each Winter goes South to play. When Waite Hoyt is not singing on the stage he is helping at his father's undertaking establishment in Brooklyn, the former Erasmus student having recently passed the State examination in embalming.

Harry Riconda is an accomplished basketball player and tours the country with his all-star team playing exhibition games. Lou Gehrig is employed in a Wall Street brokerage house. He is quoted as saying that he is learning to play a piccolo and expects to go into vaudeville. The Waner brothers, Andy Cohen and Shanty Hogan appeared in vaudeville acts last Winter and Andy is studying to pass his bar examination.

Since he has been in baseball, Herb Pennock has returned each Winter to raise silver foxes at his Kennett Square farm, near Philadelphia. Charlie Gehringer of Detroit was very bashful on the ball field during 1928, but after working as a salesman in a department store last Winter he returned to the fold as good a "barber" as any one. (In baseball jargon a "barber" is a very talkative player.) Dave Bancroft and Hank DeBerry are shoe salesmen and Rube Ehrhardt, Doug McWeeny, Pat Collins and Everett Scott operate bowling alleys. Moe Berg, having mastered seven languages in and out of college, is now working on several more.

THE SEASON OF HAGGIS HERE WITH THE BIRTHDAY OF BURNS

Old Scottish Dish to Have a Part in the Ceremonies on the Night of Jan. 25

ON the evening of Jan. 25 is celebrated the anniversary of the birth of Robert Burns. Scots and Burns lovers the world over will join in ceremonies which include the drinking of toasts, the playing of bagpipes and the eating of haggis. Traditionally haggis is consumed on Burns Night just as hot cross buns are eaten at Easter and egg-nog is served on New Year's afternoon. The haggis comes from Scotland—a relative of that dish which Burns referred to in song as "The Great Chieftain o' the Puddin' Race." It is taken usually with whisky.

In Burns's "Address to a Haggis" the concluding verse is an impromptu grace said by the poet upon dropping in at a friend's and finding a haggis served:

Ye Powers wha gie us a' that's gude
Still bless auld Caledonia's brood,
Wi' great John Barleycorn's heart blude,
In stoups and luggies,
And on our board that King o' food,
A glorious Haggis.

The name is commonly thought to be derived from the French hachis (hash, minced meat), perpetuating, as do so many Scottish words, Scotland's ancient alliance with France; but it is fully as likely that it comes from an old Scottish word, hag (hack), to chop—especially as the French themselves alluded to the dish not as hachis, but as le pain benit d'Ecosse (the sacred bread of Scotland) in the days when the haggis used to be sent to the Scots who were political exiles in France.

And certainly there is nothing French, as there is everything Scottish, about a haggis. This famous dish is essentially a kind of sausage, though woe to the Philistine who would literally so designate it on Burns Night. Like all national dishes it was evolved for the peculiar needs of a people. For a race that experienced hard physical exercise in the open air it was savory, nourishing and fortifying.

For Donald, a-hunting the wild deer and a-following the roe all day, the haggis provided a good warm meal that stayed by him. It is a compound principally of sheep's liver, of the best beef suet and minced onions, mixed with finely ground oatmeal toasted slowly until it is a light brown. The whole is seasoned with cayenne, salt and black pepper and mixed to a pudding consistency with the best beef gravy or strong broth. Sometimes the juice of a lemon is added.

This mixture is sewn into a sheep's stomach and boiled slowly for three hours. It is served very hot, without any garnish. In Highland cottages the haggis was formerly placed in the middle of the table, each person was equipped with a horn spoon, and then, the old chronicles tell us, it was "Deil tak' the hindmost."

In preparing it the bag must not be too full, lest it burst when the contents swell in cooking, and the initiated know that the haggis must not be too violently attacked when it is opened. That the Greeks had a haggis of their own is clear from Aristophanes's "The Clouds." Strepsiades entertains Socrates with a personal experience:

Why, now the murder's out!
So was I served with a stuffed paunch I broiled
On Jove's Day last, just such a scurvy trick;
Because, forsooth, not dreaming of your thunder,
I never thought to give the rascal vent,
Bounce goes the bag, and covers me all over
With its rich contents of such varied sorts.

Nevertheless the haggis nowadays is a symbol and not a food, its appearance evidence of a ceremony rather than a meal. It is always borne high on a platter, all around the banqueting hall, preceded by a piper if not by a whole pipe band. Once a year the self-exiled Scot, doing well in America or in the colonies, indulges himself in this little national sentiment. He contributes to the price of a haggis, imported from Edinburgh or Glasgow, and, a sprig of heather in his buttonhole, goes to the Burns Night celebration, rises to the toast of "Honest Men and Bonny Lasses," and perhaps chokes a little with emotion at the sound of the pipes playing "Highland Laddie" at the entrance of that "King o' food, a glorious haggis!"

Transatlantic Luxury . . . now a synonym of the BERMUDA trip

Quite in harmony—your "Furness" liner and its famous destination. Both are suited to the cultured, law-respecting element who enjoy the niceties of Transatlantic travel . . . both satisfy the whim for sport or luxurious ease . . . and the splendor afloat is a fitting prelude to the beauty ashore. The new 20,000 ton motorship "Bermuda" and the popular "Fort St. George" sail Wednesdays and Saturdays.

in your European Trip next summer without extra cost?

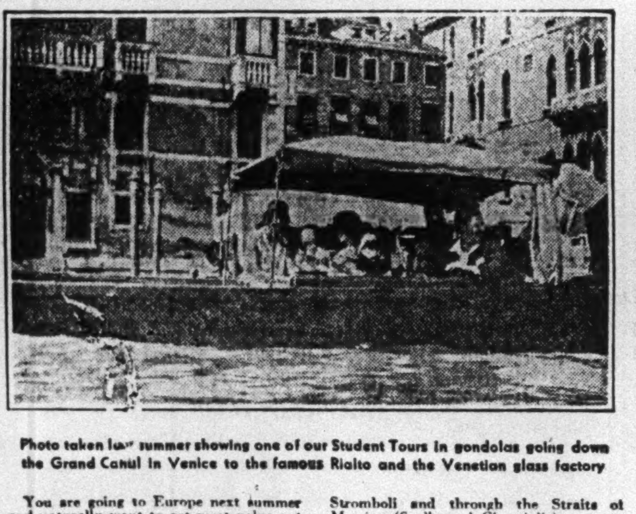

Photo taken last summer showing one of our Student Tours in gondolas going down the Grand Canal in Venice to the famous Rialto and the Venetian glass factory

You are going to Europe next summer and naturally want to get most value out of your travel investment. Why not see more than you would ordinarily without paying more?

Instead of merely going to the usual places that other tours visit, enroll in a tour which includes several off-the-beaten-path attractions like mighty Gibraltar, where a real educational thrill awaits you, then on to . . .

Sunlit Algiers, exotic and oriental, where you will see mosques and marble palaces, the castle of a great harem, Arabs and Moors, turban and fez, oriental characters out of an Eastern fairy-tale. Shop some lovely leather cushions . . . brass . . . inlaid copper . . . carved scimitars . . . wonderful gifts . . . exquisite oriental perfumes at a real bargain . . . in this African city of great contrasts.

Then sail on to beautiful Naples and motor along the Amalfi Drive to romantic Sorrento. Sail past the active volcano of Stromboli and through the Straits of Messina (Scylla and Charybdis) . . . see Sicily and Etna . . . the ancient Island of Ithaca . . . Patras in Peloponneaus . . . along the beautiful Dalmatian Coast to the glorious Bay of Cattaro, more scenic than a Norwegian fjord . . . up the Adriatic to magnificent Venice.

This is the ideal way to approach Europe . . . novel . . . different . . . far more interesting than the way your friends travelled. Now you are ready to start your tour through Europe, crossing the Continent only once and not doubling your tracks . . . saving valuable time and money.

And the rates are so low! The cruise plus whichever overland tour you choose . . . from a range of 22 different Student Tour itineraries . . . at the price of one, no higher than an ordinary tour. Send for our new free book and discover a tour that will make your friends envious and make you more popular when you come home.

HITCHCOCK GETS FULL POLO POWERS

Responsibility for Defense of International Cup Vested With Young Star.

WILL CAPTAIN THE TEAM

Personnel Virtually Will Be Selected by Him as Head of Defense Committee.

TO NAME NON-PLAYER AIDES

Action Adds Laurels to Hitchcock, Who Is One of World's Two Ten-Goal Men.

By ROBERT F. KELLEY.

Thomas Hitchcock Jr., at the age of 30, has been vested practically with full responsibility for the handling of the 1930 defense of the international polo challenge cup against the team of Great Britain which will come to Meadow Brook for another international match in September.

The executive committee of the United States Polo Association, through Louis E. Stoddard, chairman, has announced the appointment of Hitchcock as the chairman of the defense committee as well as the captain of the team. The young internationalist, generally recognized as the greatest polo player of the world, succeeds Stoddard as chairman of the defense committee. He was captain of the latest international side, the team of 1928 which defeated Argentina, succeeding to that post when Devereux Milburn retired from international competition.

In addition, the announcement says that Hitchcock was empowered to appoint a committee, subject to the approval of the executive committee, to assist him in all matters pertaining to the defense of the International Cup, held here since 1921.

The announcement practically means that Hitchcock will captain a team in action picked by himself. Thus the success or failure of the defense will rest on the choice of the young man who, since his twenty-first birthday, has been a vivid figure in action on the international polo fields of this country and Europe.

The selection of the rest of the defense committee will be made at a later date. It is possible that these men will not be named until play opens in the new season. For the 1928 series, W. Averell Harriman, Carleton F. Burke and Stoddard formed the defense committee and Hitchcock, as captain of the team, consulted with them.

The announcement does not discuss in any manner the new plans for naming the team, which it is understood on reliable authority will be used in the season to come. By the new method a squad instead of a team would be named at a date early enough to permit practicing of men and mounts and deferring the actual naming of a team until a short time before the opening match. The announcement of this plan may not be made until Mr. Hitchcock himself decides on the rest of his committee, and they may make a statement of their policy.

Milburn's Case Recalled.

The turning of what amounts to full authority for choosing his teammates over to the brilliant captain is not without precedent in the sport. As a matter of fact, it was the case with Devereux Milburn during his years as international captain, and a system of committee selection came in with the series of 1927 against England and 1928 against Argentina. It was understood that Mr. Milburn suggested this idea, feeling that he did not want the full responsibility himself.

Hitchcock's career in polo has been one of the most remarkable in any sport that this country has had. He was born in 1900 and both his father and mother have long been prominent in hunting and polo. The father, Thomas Hitchcock, was a member of the first United States team which lost to Great Britain in Newport in 1886.

The younger Hitchcock started his polo at the age of 13 and, in 1921, after flying during the war, was picked for the United States team which went to England and returned with the cup, to hold it ever since. Hitchcock has been a member of every international team since and faces a long career as the outstanding player of this country. He is at present the only player of this country to hold the top handicap rating of ten goals and there is only one other ten-goal player in the world, Lewis Lacey of Argentina.

The appointment of Mr. Hitchcock to chairmanship of the committee coupled with his continuance as captain makes him the most prominent figure of the game still in action. Mr. Stoddard has retired from international play. Hitchcock's appointment is a further indication of the rise of young players in the game.

The American team which won the final match of 1928 from Argentina included two men under 30 and one under 21. It is highly probable that this year's team will be another young one.

PENN STATE MATMEN WIN.

Triumph Over Penn Wrestling Team by 28 to 8.

Special to The New York Times.

STATE COLLEGE, Pa., Jan. 25.—Penn State's wrestlers defeated the University of Pennsylvania today, 28 to 8, taking five of the bouts by falls and one by time advantage.

Gabriel, Penn, light heavyweight, won the quickest fall of the meet, pinning Long's shoulders to the mat in 3 minutes 34 seconds.

Miss Sears Retains Title; Wins Squash Racquets Final

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 25.—Miss Eleanora Sears retained her title as Massachusetts State singles squash racquets champion today when she defeated Miss Louise Waterman, 15—10, 15—8, in the final at the Harvard Club. Miss Waterman defeated Mrs. W. F. Howe Jr., national champion, in the semi-finals, while Miss Sears disposed of Mrs. George W. Wightman.

SPRINGER IS FIRST IN SKATING DERBY

Captures Senior Race, Feature of Annual Competition, Before 30,000 in Central Park.

FINISH EXTREMELY CLOSE

Girls' Senior Silver Skates Go to Miss Mangold, Who Wins on Conservatory Lake.

In a flashing finish that thrilled the crowd of 30,000 on the slopes surrounding Conservatory Lake in Central Park yesterday afternoon Carl Springer, red-headed speedster from the Brooklyn Ice Palace, barely defeated two Majestic S. C. entrants, Ray Darmstadt and Ray Murray, to win the major prize of the ninth annual Daily News Silver Skates Derby.

Darmstadt and Murray finished second and third, respectively, but it required the judges' announcement to inform the spectators as to how the three finished, so close were they at the end. The time for the two miles was 6:44 1-5, good considering the strong wind faced on the homestretch.

Herb Taylor, who won the Middle Atlantic 1930 title at Newburgh on New Year's Day, and the favorite before the race, finished a comparatively distant fourth.

Springer, five-mile metropolitan indoor champion, took a short lead on the final lap and held it, but, when within ten yards of the tape, Darmstadt and Murray dashed out on either side of him in the sprint that made the race look like a dead heat. Springer is the second Brooklyn Ice Palace red-head to win The News Senior Derby, Bill (Red) Casey having won in 1928.

Miss Mangold Easy Victor.

Miss Mildred Mangold, also wearing the Brooklyn Ice Palace colors, ran away with the girls' senior derby, with Miss Alice Burnham, Iceland, and Miss Helen Peiper, Ice Club, finishing second and third in the one-mile race. Miss Mangold's time was 4:01 3-5 and she appeared not to be pressed in beating her only two close competitors

When curly-haired Miss Rita O'Gara skated off by herself to win the girls' intermediate derby, a half-mile event, it marked the third major victory of the day for the Brooklyn Ice Palace. Rita was followed across the line, but not closely, by Miss Peggy Miller, unattached, and Miss M. Pickering, Hawthorne, in the order named.

One of the races that stirred the keen interest of the spectators and which brought some lamentations as well as cheers was the boys' midget derby, a 220-yard contest for the little fellows, which was won by Gerald Murray, youngest representative of a skating family. Master Murray got the cheers when he broke the tape just ahead of B. Honan, but the sympathies of the crowd went to Master Jimmy McElroy.

Falls Near Finish Line.

The McElroy youngster, whose father stood in the seats near the lake with clenched hands and voicing husky calls to his son to "Come on, kid!" fell within a dozen yards of the finish line when it seemed certain that he would take the lead and the race, as he had started a sprint that was almost doubling the speed of the two leaders.

The girls' midget derby was scarcely a contest, little Teddy Gants, marked favorite in advance, skating blithely off by herself to take the race and the skates. I. LeNaire and Lois Albey, both unattached, took the next two positions, considerably behind the winner. Teddy wore the Iceland colors.

Another tumble was fatal to a potential winner in the boys' juvenile derby, won by Jimmy Alger of Albany, with C. Spellman, Deer Park, and Bill Menne, Elgas Junior H. S., second and third, respectively. Frank Spacher, George Washington H. S., led all the way, but fell on the final lap and did not finish.

Holds Lead to End.

Arti Pickering of Iceland took the boy's intermediate derby of one mile, with George Downey, New York, and J. Cosker, New York, finishing second and third. Pickering took an early lead and held it easily to the end.

The boys' junior event furnished a thrill and a surprise for spectators

LOTT BEATS MERCUR FOR CANADIAN TITLE

Chicagoan in Brilliant Rally Captures Indoor Singles Crown in Five Sets.

CONTEST IS HARD-FOUGHT

Mercur and Hall Win Doubles Championship—Lott Retains Top Western Ranking.

MONTREAL, Jan. 25 (AP).—George Lott of Chicago today won the Canadian indoor tennis singles championship by defeating Fritz Mercur of Bethlehem, Pa., in the final round, 5—7, 6—3, 1—6, 12—10, 6—4.

Lott had to stage a brilliant rally to win. The Pennsylvanian took the first and third sets to lead by two sets to one, but Lott broke his rival's morale with a victory in the long drawn-out fourth set, which went twenty-two games before the Chicagoan won it at 12—10. Lott then ran out the fifth set at 6—4 to win the match and championship.

Lott succeeds J. Gilbert Hall, South Orange, N. J., as Canadian indoor titleholder. Hall defeated Lott in the final round last year, but was eliminated in the semi-final round yesterday by Mercur.

Mercur and Hall won the doubles championship, defeating Emmet Pare of Chicago and Clifford Marsh of Buffalo in the final round, 6—2, 3—6, 6—1, 6—4. Only in the second set did Pare and Marsh give Mercur and Hall much opposition.

Lott Keeps Western Position.

CHICAGO, Jan. 25 (AP).—George Lott of Chicago held his top position in the Western Lawn Tennis Association's rankings for 1929, the official list revealed today. Johnny Hennessey of Indianapolis again was second.

Leaders in other events, listed by the association which includes Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Indiana and Ohio, were:

Men's Doubles—George O'Connell and Fred Royer, Chicago. Women's Singles—Miss Clara Louise Zinke, Cincinnati. Women's Doubles—Miss Zinke and Miss Ruth Oexman, Cincinnati. Junior Singles—William Schommer, Milwaukee. Junior Doubles—Fred Brace, Pontaic, Ill., and Nate Ganger, Cleveland. Boys' Singles—Frankie Parker, Milwaukee. Boys' Doubles—Parker and Robert Hutchinson, Lawrenceburg, Wis. Girls' Singles—Muriel Adams, Indianapolis.

Lott and Hennessey, leaders in the men's doubles rankings in 1928, were not included in the 1929 rankings because they failed to compete in a representative number of doubles matches.

Miss Zinke also topped the women singles players in 1928 as well as the doubles division with Miss Oexman. All the leaders in the boys' and girls' classes are newcomers, most of the previous leaders having passed the age limit.

First Bout in U. S. Nets Carnera $17,904, $255.77 for Every Second of 70 He Fought

For the space of one minute and ten seconds on last Friday night, Primo Carnera, humble citizen of Venice, Italy, a brief seventeen months ago, became one of the highest paid individuals in the world. Seventy seconds after he had entered the ring in Madison Square Garden to make his début in the United States against Big Boy Peterson, the giant Italian capitalized on the American's curiosity in behemoths to the extent of $17,904.

Other famous boxing personages have drawn greater purses for their ring endeavors, but few probably have been reimbursed at the rate of $255.77 a second. Big Boy Peterson, while his adventure in the ring was less pleasurable than that enjoyed by Carnera, found balm for his wounds in the fact that he was paid at the rate of $152.63 for every second of the seventy he spent in sampling the heft of Primo's punches. Peterson received $10,684.

Matchmakers, incidentally, should have little difficulty in finding opponents for Carnera, as the pugilistic field is alive with ambitious heavyweights willing to become martyrs at the rate of $152.63 a second, or perhaps even less.

The next appearance in the Garden ring of the Italian heavyweight is scheduled for April 11, and Garden officials are expected to produce an opponent who will provide more competition than was in evidence Friday night.

BOAT SHOW CLOSES WITH 2 NEW MARKS

Sales Total of $6,485,000 and Attendance of 259,000 Set New Figures for Event.

38,200 ATTEND LAST DAY

Final Crowd Largest Ever to Witness the Exposition in a Single Session.

By VERNON VAN NESS.

With a sales record for the eight days of $6,485,000 and an attendance of 259,000, the Silver Anniversary Motor Boat Show in Grand Central Palace came to a close last night. The sales and attendance figures both set new records and the closing-day crowd, 38,200, was the largest that ever witnessed the exposition in a single day.

From every boat, engine, accessory and equipment manufacturer came reports of increased business and of almost astounding new interest in motor boating. Before the exposition opened President Henry R. Sutphen of the National Association of Engine and Boat Manufacturers, under whose auspices the annual show is staged, prophesied that sales would be approximately $5,000,000. Thus the final total figures, though only an estimate, topped President Sutphen's guess by nearly $1,500,000.

As the last night crowd streamed through the aisles inspecting the exhibits on the first four floors of the Palace, there was a final rush of individual buyers and the last contingent of agency and dealer orders came in to swell the sales figures. Besides these figures individual manufacturers reported future orders reaching into several millions of dollars.

Statement Is Issued.

The success with which the show met was amply taken notice of in an official way and President Sutphen issued the following statement at the closing:

"When reviewing the accomplishments of the twenty-sixth annual Motor Boat Show we, the executives of the motor boat industry, are assured that 1930 will be a year of progress and prosperity. The attendance at the show this year of a quarter of a million persons or more has shown the wide-spread interest in motor boating.

"It has been distinctly a buying public and the record of sales for the show has exceeded our most sanguine expectations. Due to the market fluctuations we were faced with the problem of a possible falling off in sales. Just the reverse has been true.

"From the standpoint of development the motor boat industry faces a period of increased activities. Old production methods are giving away to modern operating schedules, and standardization is being continuously felt in every field of boating. This

LOW GEAR, AT 8 TO 5, TRIUMPHS AT MIAMI

Wentzel's Entry Closes With a Rush to Take Feature Before 10,000.

MOLASSES JANE IS SECOND

Is Beaten by Length, but Easily Saves Place From Dunmore —Field of 7 Starts.

Special to The New York Times.

MIAMI, Fla., Jan. 25.—Arthur Wentzel's Low Gear won his second consecutive race today when he was first in the Miami Herald Handicap before 10,000 racing enthusiasts.

The favorite, and backed down from 2 to 1 to 8 to 5, Low Gear carried 120 pounds and came on so fast in the last furlong that he jumped from third place to the lead and then was going away at the finish of the mile and seventy yards. A length further back came Molasses Jane, which beat Dunmore four lengths for second honors. Four others completed the field.

Wentzel's horse is a gelded son of Sir Martin and Jitney, and is now 5 years old, but seldom has he run as well as he did today. A slow starter, he was outrun in the early part and gave his backers some uneasy moments, for there were only seven running and at the end of half a mile Low Gear was seventh. The Mullrick Stable entry of Sand Fiddler and Herade were dividing the honors at this time, running in front almost as a team.

Low Gear Closes Ground.

It was approaching the bend in the backstretch that Low Gear began to close ground. He moved up steadily and not with a rush. Molasses Jane was running right behind the Mullrick pair, and making a move back of Low Gear was Dunmore.

The swing around the bend saw Sand Fiddler and Herade begin to fade. The latter held on best, but was only a head before Molasses Jane swinging into the stretch. Low Gear was on the outside now and was covering extra ground, but doing it so fast that he had little to worry about.

Herade gave up the ghost somewhat more than a furlong from home and Molasses Jane was in front for only a few steps as Low Gear rushed by in a cloud of dust and was moving away at the end.

Dunmore also continued to close ground and he was a fast-going third even if a distant one. The time of the race was 1:42 3-5, only two-fifths of a second slower than Old Slip's 1926 track record.

Bray Saddles Another Winner.

Frank Bray, who saddled Tutti Frutti for a smashing victory yesterday, sent out Stand By in the colors of the Brandon Stable and again had the satisfaction of seeing a winner. Stand By was ridden by Eddie Barnes, also the rider of Tutti Frutti, and came home half a length in front of Nichelson, which led Sun Broom, the 11-to-5 favorite, by a length. The winner paid 16 to 5.

Clean Play was next and three others completed the procession. Stand By's time was 1:06 3-5 for the five and a half furlongs, and he carried 115 pounds.

It remained for a 12-to-1 shot that had been backed down from 25 to 1 to beat the favorite in the second race. The public choice was Apt, and she closed at 6 to 5.

There was crowding in the race in which Dark Simon, the winner, was involved and which Apt missed, but Dark Simon went on to win notwithstanding and Apt could get no better than second. Water Fowl was third, two lengths back of Apt.

Conger's Drive Brings Triumph in Mile—Wells Ties World's Hurdles Mark—10,000 at Meet.

By ARTHUR J. DALEY.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Jan. 25.—A victory and a defeat was the portion of the two internationalists in features of the William C. Prout memorial games tonight in the Boston Garden before a crowd of 10,000. First, Dr. Paul Martin, Swiss champion for twelve years, came in fourth to Russell Chapman of Bates, Phil Edwards of New York University and Harold Cutbill of the Millrose A. A. in the Bishop Cheverus 1,000-yard run, and then Stanislaw Petkiewicz of Poland won readily from a mediocre and unrepresentative field in the Leo Larrivee two-mile run.

It was a de[illegible] for both of them. Dr. Martin had failed to win in three handicap races in this country and this was his first scratch race. Petkiewicz had run not at all. But, strange as it may seem, the loser looked far better than the winner.

The Polish champion displayed good form and an easy, effortless stride, but the time he turned in was hardly what one would expect of a conqueror of the great Paavo Nurmi. Caught at the worsted in 9:39 2-5, Petkiewicz was exactly forty-one and one-fifth seconds slower than the brilliant record established five years ago by the once peerless Paavo.

All the competition disappeared from this race before Governor Frank G. Allen of Massachusetts fired the gun that started the field on its journey. Fordham's husky freshman intercollegiate cross-country champion, Joe McCluskey, was withdrawn from the test for some inexplicable reason and inserted against Ray Conger in the Curley mile where he did not have a ghost of a chance of winning.

Jellison Presses Invader.

Twice this season Coach Jake Weber's protégé has run two miles and in both races he did about 9:32 without being too sternly pressed.

But even with McCluskey a disconsolate spectator on the side lines Petkiewicz had to battle continually with the little known Russell Jellison of the Boston A. A. for the lead and won only by fifty yards over a distance runner that Nurmi could have spotted a full lap in his best days and then soundly beaten.

In extenuation of Dr. Martin's defeat it must be stated that the thousand was a trifle long for him, but still he showed a gameness and a promise that will surely be fulfilled before the indoor season wanes.

Greater than the surprise of Dr. Martin's defeat was the vanquishing of Edwards in that same race by Chapman, the New England intercollegiate half-mile champion, whom Edwards had outdistanced in the I. C. A. A. A. A. title games at Philadelphia last Spring.

Never better than fourth for all but the last lap, Chapman came on with an all-conquering rush in the final circuit to neatly turn the tables on his conqueror of eight months ago. Up to that decisive and deciding last whirl around the boards, the Violet ace was out ahead.

Tries to Increase Speed.

Two turns from the finish Edwards had the race well in hand. But just as the bell tinkled its warning Chapman had come up like a streak to pass all but Edwards. At the turn the Violet flyer glanced out of the corner of his eye and noticed the red-shirted whirlwind sailing along at his side. He strove desperately to accelerate his speed, but to no avail.

Chapman had a five-yard margin over Coach Emil von Elling's star at the wire. Meanwhile another battle was being fought in the rear. Harold Cutbill of the Millrose A. A., world's record-holder at the distance, uncorked one of the finishing spurts that once made him famous to barely nip Martin at the worsted for third place. Chapman was clocked in 2:16 3-5, tidy figures for the distance.

In another feature Bernie McCafferty of Holy Cross ran a beautiful, courageous 440-yard race to capture the Prout Memorial Perpetual Trophy for the second successive year. Placed on the outside lane by the fortune of the draw, the dark-haired Holy Cross youngster was tossed aside like driftwood by a wave in the mad scramble for the pole.

McCafferty spun up on the edge on the banked turn, balanced precariously at the top, and then righted himself just in time to scamper after the four other starters who had opened up a gap of from ten to twelve yards over him.

Pete Bowen, the national and intercollegiate quarter-mile champion, showed the way with Eddie Roll of the Newark A. C., former metropolitan 440-yard titleholder; Arnold Noyes, national junior quarter-mile king, and Norman St. Clair at his heels.

Passes Noyes in Backstretch.

It looked like an almost insurmountable obstacle for McCafferty to overcome. But heart and legs responded in unison. He passed Noyes in a sprint down the first backstretch; climbed up to third in back of Bowen and Roll at the completion of the first lap, and then set out full tilt for the golden shirt of Bowen some five yards ahead.

Roll was overtaken half a lap from

North Ypres, Longest Shot of Last Six Years, Wins at Agua Caliente, Paying $462 for $2

AGUA CALIENTE, Mexico, Jan. 25 (AP).—The longest shot in the last six years on the American turf went over today, when North Ypres won the fourth race at Agua Caliente and paid $462.80 for a $2 mutuel ticket.

The record for recent years of racing in America is held by Fincastle, which won at Havana in December, 1923, at odds of 350 to 1. The price paid by North Ypres, however, exceeded the longest shot of 1929. Calgary Kay paid $374.10 for a $2 investment at Kennilworth in Canada in July of last year to top the victories of rank outsiders.

North Ypre's victory today was the first triumph in five starts for the 3-year-old from the Narthway Stable. His last start was July 15 at Arlington Park, when he finished eleventh in a field of fifteen. His best previous effort was third in a sprint at Washington Park. In today's five and one-half furlong dash two other outsiders, Chief's Warrior and Bon Bobby, ran two, three. Dark Sea, one-half of the Willis Sharp Kilmer entry, which was quoted at the prohibitive odds of 10 cents on the dollar, finished fourth.

Hertzweig Trophy Won by Proudlock in 600-Yard Race at Meet in Brooklyn

PROUDLOCK VICTOR IN BROOKLYN RACE

Wins 600-Yard Run in Norwegian Turn Meet to Gain Hertzweig Trophy.

BEATS BRENNAN BY A FOOT

Jennings Finishes 3d, a Yard Behind —2,000 See Athletic Carnival in Armory.

Oliver Proudlock, former intercollegiate half-mile champion while a student at Syracuse, captured the 600-yard run which featured the fifth annual athletic carnival of the Norwegian Turn Society at the Second Naval Battalion Armory in Brooklyn last night.

The former Syracuse star, now running under the colors of the Newark A. C., gained permanent possession of the Olaf Hertzweig trophy by his victory, which was witnessed by a crowd of 2,000 persons.

Proudlock, despite the fact that he took the lead with the starting gun, scored his triumph by the narrow margin of one foot, just beating John Brennan of the N. Y. A. C., in 1 minute, 15 1-5 seconds. Charles Jennings of the Newark A. C., was third, a yard behind Brennan.

Proudlock's achievement gave him the Hertzweig trophy by the narrow margin of one point. Before last night's race, Phil Edwards, N. Y. U., middle distance luminary, was in the lead for the trophy. Edwards defeated Proudlock in the first two races for the prize, but the Violet star was unable to compete last night, taking part in the Prout Memorial games in Boston.

A blanket finish featured the sixty-meter dash, which was won by Sol H. Furth of N. Y. U. in the fast time of 7 seconds.

The speedy New York University quartet of Jules Shapiro, Marvin Demler, Fred Humphrey and Milton Sandler captured the two-mile college relay easily in 8:06 3-5. The Manhattan College team was second, fifty yards behind the winners, while St. John's College was third, nearly a lap behind N. Y. U.

DAYTON, Ohio, Jan. 25 (AP).—Joe F. Carr of Columbus was re-elected president and secretary of the National Professional Football League and Carl L. Storck of Detroit was renamed vice president and treasurer at the annual Winter meeting of the league today.

All of the twelve clubs that were members of the circuit in 1929 will retain their franchises, according to the announcement of the president. Applications were received from three other cities for membership and they will be referred to the executive committee which was named at the session.

Sports of the Times

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

By JOHN KIERAN.

FOR a big fellow, Primo Carnera showed plenty of speed at the Garden Friday night. So did Big Boy Peterson. Few fighters could have made such rapid trips to the canvas.

Carnera looked as though he were designed by Tony Sarg and erected by Stone & Webster. If he ever crashes, the Merritt-Chapman Company will have to be called in to hoist up the hulk.

When they put the measuring rod on the Gargantuan Gondolier he shrank some three or four inches. When Stribling measured him with a right cross he fell off more than that.

In fairness to ponderous Primo it should be said that he surprised the spectators and was more agile than most of them expected him to be. On the other hand, Big Boy Peterson ranks among the fastest falling bodies and presented no problem at all. As a test of Carnera, it was a washout.

It's the usual custom to bring these valuable importations along on a careful diet and for the next few weeks the voluminous Venetian will be working on easy marks. It will give him experience and he'll need a little of that before bumping into Victorio Campolo, the dismounted gaucho from the Argentine.

Peterson went down once from a push rather than a blow but some pushes are given with authority. Any one who has ever been nudged by an elephant can realize that.

A bout that would tax the capacity of Bronx Park would be a meeting between Primo the Ponderous and Maxie Rosenbloom. The suspicion is that, early in the first round, Carnera would have to hire a couple of guides to help him find Maxie. At the same time Carnera would know that Maxie was all around him somewhere.

By the same token, Rosenbloom might have all the trouble he could handle with Larry Johnson, who brought down Fred Lenhart with a beautiful wing shot. This Lenhart is a good fighter, too.

Jabs and Jolts.

The raspberry chorus greeted Phil Scott when he was introduced in the ring. He is probably content to take the cash and let the credit go.

Campolo is about as tall as Carnera but the dismounted gaucho isn't nearly as bulky as the voluminous Venetian. Carnera's underpinning would never earn him a place in a musical comedy chorus. As they say in the rural districts, he must have hay in his shoes. His calves run right down into his feet.

A ringside ballot indicated that Primo was funny and, at the same time, no joke. Even if he disposed of nothing at all when he toppled Big Boy Peterson, he moved his hands rapidly and that's more than some of these overgrown fighters can do.

Mr. Hugh Walpole, the distinguished English novelist, thinks that Primo is sure to be the champion of the world in time, which recalls that Bernard Shaw was sure that M'sieu Georges Carpentier would slaughter Jack Dempsey.

If they want a real test for Carnera, they might invite Paulino to step in with him. Most of the big fellows have had a shot at the wild woodchopper without doing him any great harm.

Carnera came into the ring wearing a bright green tunic and a cap to match, which will probably bring a joint protest from Italy and Ireland.

The heavyweight field now includes an Englishman, an American, a German, an Italian, a Basque, a Norwegian and an Argentinean. It's high time somebody tossed in a Chinaman.

Odds and Ends.

They made Gene Sarazen shovel a barrowful of silver dollars at the Agua Caliente Club and then presented him with a check for $10,000. If that's the union rate for shoveling silver dollars, some of our treasury workers are grossly underpaid.

Gene won the big prize at Agua Caliente by whirling around the links on the last lap for a 68. That was how he captured the national open title at Skokie in 1922.

Bob Jones goes in for killing them off with a fast third round. That puts the burden on the pursuers. The method isn't important. It's the stroke total that counts.

Bob Shawkey should be wary in trading off good players. That wasn't the way the late Miller Huggins built up his great teams. He rarely let a good man go, no matter what the inducement.

Hug traded Urban Shocker and later brought him back again. The only other player he regretted trading was Muddy Ruel. Of course, John McGraw traded stars back and forward all around the league and his record will stand close scrutiny. But Shawkey hasn't yet proved himself another McGraw.

Travis Jackson thinks that Eddie Marshall will round out the Giant infield this coming season. The youngster looked like a fine fielder in the few games he played at the Polo Grounds late last year. But there arises the rather important question: Can he hit? And if so, how often?

You can't call that a fight among the Brooklyn Club directors any more. It's a Seven Years' War. The man who settles it will be entitled to the Nobel Peace Prize for the year.

PETKIEWICZ TAKES FIRST RACE IN U. S.

By ARTHUR J. DALEY.

the wire, but with pace that began to waver, Bowen slowly dropped back as the pounding Purple ace streaked along rentlenessly, hot on his trail. A terrific kick of his strong-muscled legs and McCafferty was clear of all pursuers. Roll strode along doggedly and chased McCafferty across the finish line, three yards to the rear. Another three yards back came Noyes with St. Clair a similar distance behind. Bowen jogged in last, completely wearied by his early pace. The winner's time was 0:52 4-5.

The terrific last lap kick that has gained him victories over Nurmi, Edvine Wide, Eino Purje, Lloyd Hahn and Leo Lermond again stood Conger in good stead as he galloped past Gus Moore of the Brooklyn Harriers to capture the Curley mile in the fine early season time of 4:22. As usual Conger held back in second place until the bell and then scooted around Moore and won effortlessly by eight yards.

Monty Wells, old Dartmouth hurdler, twice equalled his own world's record in the 45-yard high hurdles event as he again captured the New England A. A. U. timber-topping crown which has been his own personal property since his college days. In the semi-final and final Wells streaked over the barriers in 0:05 4-5.

Bowman Beaten by Daly.

In another feature Jimmy Daly of Holy Cross, national and intercollegiate indoor sprint king, won the special 50-yard dash from Chet Bowman of the Newark A. C. in 0:05 2-5, one-fifth of a second behind the world's mark.

Two New York teams competed in the relay events of the carnival successfully when Fordham's team of Johnny Smith, John O'Shea, Ray Hurley and George Simons defeated a formidable Boston University four and a Columbus Council quartet conquired a Boston A. A. team.

not acquainted with the contestants. This mile race was won by Al Krux, Majestic S. C., who kept himself well back in the pack until the final lap, when he came up from the sixth place to take the lead and the race. He showed a speed reserve that far outclassed his field. J. J. Judge of the Wayne Club finished second, and J. Silberberg, Iceland, third. The time, 3:33, was not particularly fast.

Conditions for the event, repeatedly postponed because of weather conditions, were very good save for the strong wind that the skaters had to buck on the stretch from the final turn to the tape. The ice was hard, in marked contrast to the soft and treacherous surfaces of several previous events, and spills were less frequent. Due to the large number of entrants in the eight classes, qualifying heats were run off in several instances two at a time, in order to speed up the action and clear the way for the main events.

TENNIS SELECTIONS BRING SPLIT HERE

Eastern Body Votes Down a Plan for Blanket Approval of Proposed National Ticket.

VAN BLOEM IS RE-ELECTED

President Leads Forces Which Win Fight to Send Delegates to St. Louis Uninstructed.

By ALLISON DANZIG.

The probability of spirited opposition developing to the report of the nominating committee of the United States Lawn Tennis Association at the annual meeting of the association in St. Louis on Feb. 15 was revealed yesterday when the delegates of the Eastern Lawn Tennis Association, in annual session at the Hotel Vanderbilt, voted down a recommendation that its representatives to the national meeting be instructed to support the entire ticket for 1930.

For an hour or more the matter was discussed pro and con, with Julian S. Myrick, former national president, and Walter Merrill Hall, president of the West Side Tennis Club, leading the forces favoring the recommendation, and Louis B. Dailey, nominee for president of the U. S. L. T. A., and P. Schuyler Van Bloem, president of the Eastern Association, leading the opposition.

The seriousness with which the proposition was taken was evidenced in the statement made by Mr. Van Bloem in his report as president that he did not want to be re-elected as head of the Eastern Association if that body was going to send its delegates to St. Louis with blanket instructions to vote for the national ticket of 1930. The fact that the West Side Tennis Club had gone on record recently as favoring such a recommendation made Mr. Van Bloem all the more concerned as to how the Eastern Association, of which the West Side Club is the largest club member, would vote on the matter.

The association first re-elected Mr. Van Bloem as president early in the meeting and later voted down the recommendation.

Centre of the Controversy.

It is understood that the opposition which is expected to develop in St. Louis to the nominating ticket for 1930 is not directed at the officers who have been named but at the members of the nominating committee which has been offered to select the officers for 1931.

Mr. Dailey, the present vice president of the U. S. L. T. A., is slated to be elected president, succeeding Samuel H. Collom of Philadelphia; Louis J. Carruthers, present treasurer, has been nominated for vice president; James C. Stewart of Chicago is nominated for re-election as secretary, and Donald M. Hill of Waban, Mass., for treasurer.

The nominating committee for the ensuing year as named by the outgoing nominating committee, consists of Charles S. Garland of Chicago, chairman; A. N. Reggio of Boston and William R. Breck of Philadelphia. Franklin F. Bradley is chairman of the outgoing nominating committee and the other two members are Garland and Josiah Wheelwright.

As a result of the defeat of the recommendation, the representatives of the Eastern Association will go to St. Louis without any definite instructions as to how they shall vote on the ticket.

Debate on Fund Distribution.

The prolonged discussion on this proposition was followed by another debate as to whether the Eastern Association should make any recommendation to the national meeting as to the amount of the assets the U. S. L. T. A. should distribute to the sectional associations. The association took no action.

One other recommendation, sponsored by Mr. Myrick and Mr. Hall, was endorsed unanimously, and that was that the association's representatives be instructed to vote at St. Louis in favor of an international open tournament.

That the West Side Tennis Club intends to make a serious bid for the national amateur championship again this year was indicated when President Hall asked that the meeting instruct its delegates to support the club's application for the championship at St. Louis. Last year Philadelphia was prepared to make a fight for this tournament, but withdrew from the field with the announcement that it would demand the tournament in 1930. Unless an open championship is held this year and held by the Germantown Cricket Club, it is expected that a lively struggle will develop between Philadelphia and New York for the amateur tournament.

The East-West matches will be held at the West Side Tennis Club as usual. The metropolitan championship was applied for "tentatively" by the Crescent A. C., which has held it for many years. The Eastern grass court championships for men and women were awarded to the Westchester Country Club.

Jackson Heights Seeks Tourney.

The metropolitan clay court championship for men was applied for by both the New York Tennis Club, where it has been a fixture for years, and the Jackson Heights Tennis Club. The awarding of the tourney was referred to the executive committee for decision, as also were a number of other championships for which there were no applications.

The Eastern clay court championship will be held at the Travers Island courts of the New York A. C. The Montclair A. C. will conduct the Eastern women's clay court championship and the men's New Jersey State clay court championship. The Jackson Heights Tennis Club was awarded the women's New York State clay court event and the New Jersey clay court championship for women went to the Westfield Tennis Club. Union College was awarded the New York State intercollegiate championship on clay.

The tournaments for which there were no applications were the men's New York State clay court championship, the women's New York State grass court championship, the men's New Jersey grass court championship, the women's New Jersey grass court championship and the metropolitan championships for women on both grass and clay.

In addition to President Van Bloem, who was also appointed the association's sectional delegate on the national executive committee, the following officers were elected: Benjamin H. Dwight, first vice president; Howard C. Barth, second vice president; Louis B. Dailey Jr., secretary, and E. R. Merry, treasurer. Albert J. Cawse heads the nominating committee for 1930.

Colgate and Army Sextets Play 2-2 Tie—Navy Swimmers Defeat Penn, 43-19

ARMY AND COLGATE TIE, 2-2, AT HOCKEY

Two Overtime Periods Fail to Break Deadlock in Fast Game at West Point.

COLLEGIANS LEAD AT START

Lindquist Scores Cadets' Two Goals in the Third Session to Knot the Count.

Special to The New York Times.

WEST POINT, N. Y., Jan. 25.—Army and Colgate could not reach a decision on the ice today after three regular and two overtime periods in a 2-to-2 game played on Stuart Rink. The up-State collegians took the lead in the opening period, and although they fought the Cadets' heavy attack off successfully throughout the second session, Lindquist, who is starring for Army this season, skated through the Colgate defense, and alone loomed before Squires to score Army's tying goal early in the third period.

Fisher came back quickly for Colgate, tallying on a pass from Nelson in 5:15.

Army's offensive play quickened, and Lindquist again got loose with the puck and was down the ice into Colgate's net in 7:40, once more knotting the count. Colgate's skaters bombarded Army's net in the final minutes of play, and Waters, who had thirty-three stops to his credit, was down on his knees in his defensive play against the collegians most of the time.

The game was the first this season to be played on Army's own ice on Stuart Rink.

The line-up:

Army (2).		Colgate (2).
Waters	Goal	Squires
Cotter	Defense	Walker
Tapping	Defense	MacSwan
Lindquist	Centre	Howe
Goodrich	Wing	Nelson
Rothschild	Wing	Hofheins

Goals—First period: Anderson, Colgate, 18:20. Second period: no scoring. Third period: Lindquist, Army, 2:50; Fisher, Colgate, 1:55; Lindquist, Army, 7:40. First and second overtime periods: No scoring.

Spares—Army: Carter, Darcy, Sweeney, Cain, Black, Tisdale, Huglin, Turpin. Colgate: Vasil, Terry, Fisher, Crane, Hamilton, Anderson.

Referee—C. Mitchell. Time of periods—20 minutes.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., Jan. 25.—The Naval Academy won two decisive victories today over the University of Pennsylvania, in the swimming meet by 43 to 19, and a game of water polo by 75 to 16.

By winning in water polo in such conclusive style, Navy made a good start toward another championship in that sport, as Penn was considered to have an unusually strong team this season. O'Beirne of Navy was high scorer with six touch goals.

During the first half, when the Navy team was in full strength, Penn's total score consisted of two foul goals. Navy indicated by its victory today that it has a well-balanced, rather than a brilliant team, though in Phillips and Mustin it has two promising sprinters.

The swim meet developed a high-grade fancy diver in Grandy of the visitors, who far outscored Lucas of the Navy.

British Betting Board Plans Pool to Rival the Calcutta

Great interest has been aroused in England by the announcement that the Racecourse Betting Control Board, a body operating under the control of Parliament, is considering the promotion of an ante-post pool on the Epsom Derby. This board is responsible for the operation of the totalisator in Great Britain. It is expected that such a pool would overshadow both the Calcutta and the Stock Exchange draws in its appeal to the public. Under the plan proposed, a participant in the pool could buy a ticket on a horse at the course totalisators or obtain a ticket weeks before the Derby through the usual channels.

Kojac, Olympic backstroke champion and holder of numerous intercollegiate championships, is likely to swim in the 50 and 100-yard dashes and in the relay.

The first week's work was devoted to conditioning and as the players gradually swing into stride the squad will be divided into four groups and two games will be staged each week, thus giving every aspirant a chance to show his ability in actual competition.

Nine lettermen, comprising some of the most able players on last year's eleven, will be lost by graduation this June. They include Don Holt, end; Bill Koenig, Lacy Harper and Fenton Adkins, tackles; Captain Ray Farris and Bud Eskew, guards; Jimmy Ward and Phil Jackson, halfbacks, and Yank Spaulding, fullback. POINT FOR BATTLE TUESDAY

Iowa State Matmen Expect Hard Struggle Against Missouri Wrestlers

Iowa State College matmen are pointing for their match with Missouri in the State gymnasium at Ames on Tuesday, when the Big Six season opens. The team has a record of two victories and one defeat in pre-conference meets and with the exception of the Oklahoma Aggies, Missouri is the only wrestling squad that has been able to defeat Iowa State in a dual meet during the last six years.

With one conference victory to its credit so far this season, that of Kansas State, the Missouri aggregation is regarded as one of the strongest Big Six teams of 1930, and Coach Hugo Otopalik of Iowa State is predicting a hard battle with the Tigers.

Wisconsin Basketball Mentor Urges Cubs to 'Hit the Books'

One reason why Dr. Walter T. Meanwell, Wisconsin basketball coach, seldom loses any members of his squads through scholastic ineligibility was revealed recently by a sign which appeared on the freshman training room door. It read: "No practice until further notice—hit the books." The coach keeps close check of the class work of the players and never lets them forget that their first duty in the university is to their academic work. Moreover, a student whose future classroom work is in serious doubt is not encouraged to try for the basketball team.

A two-week lay-off for the freshmen, such as the present one, is characteristic of Meanwell's policy. Wisconsin cub candidates for the five practice only twice a week—thus spending less actual time on the game than that demanded of first-year students who take the required work in physical education.

INDIANA AWAITS NEW TERM.

Following a lull in sports activities during the examination period, athletes at Indiana University are preparing for the new term. Sports will be resumed on Feb. 3, when the basketball five will visit St. Louis to oppose Washington University, which defeated the Hoosiers last year, 31 to 30. Indiana will resume its Western Conference schedule on Feb. 15 against Chicago.

ST. JOHN'S QUINTET IS BEATEN, 31 TO 21

Brooklyn Team Humbled for the First Time This Season by Providence College.

HAD WON 12 GAMES IN ROW

Fast Passing Game by Opponents Decides Issue in Contest on Rhode Islanders' Court.

Special to The New York Times.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Jan. 25.—The St. John's College of Brooklyn basketball team, which had been undefeated all season, was turned back by the Providence College quintet tonight, 31 to 21. The Brooklyn five had won twelve games in a row.

Last year the Providence team was one of the only two that turned back the St. John's five. Although the winners' record was not nearly as impressive as that of St. John's, it was realized by all that a close battle could be expected tonight—and such was the case.

The winners used a fast passing game that was highly effective, and, while St. John's Also handled the ball well, Providence had the edge. The guarding on both sides was of a high grade, but the goal-shooting was brilliant.

Providence jumped into the lead at the start and at half-time led, 16 to 9. St. John's came back in the second and after four minutes of play tied the score.

From then on until five minutes from the end it was an even battle, but Providence nosed out St. John's by a great rally and collected ten points to make the victory certain.

Schuckman of St. John's was the star of the Brooklyn team, while McCue, Wheeler and Kreiger starred for Providence College. It was the sixth straight victory for Providence College.

North Carolina to Construct 4 All-Weather Tennis Courts

The athletic authorities at the University of North Carolina gave added impetus to tennis recently when they ordered the construction of four all-weather courts. The hard surface will consist of a deep layer of crushed rock. This will be treated with a gravity flux of oil poured on while hot. Before the oil cools, a layer of cedar sawdust will be spread on and packed with a heavy roller. This produces a surface that has a give to it—something akin to cork. A. D. Browne, director of physical education at Peabody College, Knoxville, Tenn., will superintend the final preparations.

Red and Blue Records Twelfth Victory in Fourteen Starts So Far This Season.

TANSEER LEADS THE ATTACK

Registers Five Field Goals for the Victors, Who Lead at Half-Time by 13 to 10 Count.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 25.—For the second time in less than two weeks the Penn basketball team defeated the Naval Academy in the Palestra tonight, 29 to 20, before a crowd of 6,500. It was Penn's twelfth victory in fourteen starts this season.

Len Tanseer, sophomore guard, led the Red and Blue attack with five field goals, while Fred Ullrich and Mickey McNiff, also sophomores on the team, came through with three field goals apiece.

Captain Ed Colestock played the best for the Middies with three field goals and four fouls out of five tries. He was ruled out late in the second half for committing his fourth personal foul. Allen was also forced out for the same reason.

Penn was away off in its shooting in the first half as well as foul tossing. Only one of the six foul tries was made. After Captain Lobley went in the Penn line-up at centre midway in the first half the team picked up momentum, the half-time score finding Penn in the lead, 13 to 10.

Lobley, Tanseer and Ullrich quickly forced up the Penn score at the start of the second half, but when Coach Eddie McNichol started to send in many substitutes the Middies gathered a few baskets.

CADETS LEAD AT HALF, 16-8

Set Fast Pace After Resumption and Quickly Increase Edge—Both Teams Guard Well.

Special to The New York Times.

WEST POINT, N. Y., Jan. 25.—Army, after losing two in a row at basketball, got back into winning stride today and defeated the University of New Hampshire in a fast, hard game, by 35 to 25.

The game was marked by clever defensive work on both sides, Army's guarding, particularly, during the first half, which ended, 16 to 8 in the Cadets' favor, being a feature.

New Hampshire took the lead at the outset on clean shots from scrimmage, Gaunt, Small and Patch shooting field goals. After five minutes of play the Granite State five led by 8 to 5. It was then that the Cadets bolstered their defense play, and the half closed with the visitors failing to count again. During this interval, however, weak work on tries from the foul line by New Hampshire kept it from counting.

Army got away fast early in the second half, increasing its lead until the count was 25 to 18. At this point New Hampshire put on a burst of speed which gave it several field goals, Small and Gaunt again figuring in the scoring. For Army Strother and Kreuger tossed in baskets to keep Army's margin intact.

The longest baseball schedule in the history of City College has been mapped out for Dr. Harold J. Parker's nine for the approaching 1930 season, according to the list released by College Manager of Athletics Professor Walter Williamson. Twenty-three contests are scheduled, twelve of them for the home diamond at the Lewisohn Stadium and the other eleven for foreign diamonds.

Princeton's return to the Lavender schedule is one of the features of the list. The Tigers used to be annual rivals of the C. C. N. Y. nine, but for almost a decade have not met the Lavender. The game is slated for May 28, the day before the closing game with Manhattan College.

A three-game series with St. John's College of Brooklyn is another feature. The first two games will be played on a home-and-home basis, and then if a third game is needed to break the tie between the two metropolitan rivals the Vincentians will oppose Dr. Parker's team at the Lewisohn Staudium on May 26.

The schedule:

March 29, St. Francis College.

April 2, Long Island University; 5, St. John's College; 10, Pratt Institute; 11, Providence College at Providence, R. I.; 12, Springfield College at Springfield, Mass.; 16, Stevens Institute of Technology at Hoboken; 19, Massachusetts Agricultural College; 23, Upsala College; 26, Lehigh University; 30, Manhattan College at Manhattan.

OXFORD-CAMBRIDGE OARSMEN UNDER WAY

Start Preparations for Annual Race to Be Held on the Thames on April 12.

Both the Oxford and Cambridge crews have begun practice for the annual race between these two universities which will take place on April 12 on the Thames. This date is earlier than usual, but was decided upon because of the tides.

Cambridge was the first to get to work. When its candidates reported for the start of their training, one familiar face was missing. This was the veteran university boatman, Cooie Phillips, who has followed the fortunes of Cambridge crews for the last thirty-six years. Owing to illness he was unable to superintend the launching of the boat.

The Cambridge crew started work under favorable conditions—a good head of water and wind negligible. The twelve oarsmen who were summoned for early work were in an eight and a four. The eight was coached by J. C. Holcroft, former president, and the four by T. R. B. Sanders, the Cambridge University Boat Club treasurer. All the men warned at the end of last term made their appearance, with the exception of D. St. J. Gogarty (Pembroke), whose place was taken by A. S. Reeve (Selwyn), a bowside oarsman, who did well at No. 5 in the winning trial eight.

All of the available Blues took their seats in the eight as follows: T. A. Brockleband, stroke; R. A. Davies-Cooke, No. 7; M. H. Warriner, president, No. 5, and N. M. Aldous, secretary, No. 2. The four was launched first and paddled down stream, and the eight followed shortly afterward. Only light work was undertaken in easy stages.

Oxford got under way in weather that was delightfully fine, but there was a cold wind and rather too much of it, so that, for the first outing, the conditions were rather trying. The Thames had risen at the start of the week, but there was a fall of about three inches by the time the crew got out on the water, which, however, was very bumpy. There was an excessive stream running and the Meadows were completely flooded.

The president, A. Graham of Brasenose, undertook the coaching. He was accompanied by Dr. P. C. Mallam. The crew was composed entirely of men who had rowed in last term's trials, choice of stroke falling on C. M. Johnston (Brasenose), who stroked the winning trial eight. C. F. Martineau (University College), who stroked the winners, found a place at No. 2. D. E. Tinne was in his old seat at No. 7, M. J. Waterhouse, who rowed beind Martineau at Henley, being given the bow thwart.

Altogether, University College had four members included in the crew and in addition provided the coxswain, H. A. C. Durbridge.

The order of rowing of each eight follows:

Cambridge.

Bow, D. Haig Thomas (Eton and Lady Margaret); No. 2, N. M. Aldous (St. John's Leatherhead and Selwyn); No. 3, A. S. Reeve (Brighton and Selwyn); No. 4, P. M. Carpmael (Oundle and Jesus); No. 5, M. H. Warriner (Harrow and First Trinity); No. 6, F. Bradley (Leighton Park, Reading and Pembroke); No. 7, R. A. Davies Crooke (Eton and Third Trinity). Stroke, T. A. Brocklebank (Eton and Third Trinity). Coxswain, R. E. Swartout (Middlesex, U. S. A. and First Trinity).

Oxford.

Bow, M. J. Waterhouse (Eton and Balliol); No. 2, C. F. Martineau (Harrow and University College); No. 3, N. K. Hutton (Fettes and University College; No. 4, R. H. Dutton (Australia and University College; No. 5, J. A. Ingles (University of Tasmania and Magdalen); No. 6, L. Clive (Eton and Christ Church); No. 7, D. E. Tinne (Eton and University College). Stroke, C. M. Johnston (Shrewsbury and Brasenose). Coxswain, H. A. C. Durbridge (Malvern and University College).

OARSMEN AT YALE HOLD DAILY DRILLS

Four Varsity and Many Class Crews Working in Tank Despite Examinations.

TAPPEN STILL AT STROKE

Palmer, Regular Pacemaker Last Spring, Offering Keen Opposition—No Line-Up Permanent.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Jan. 25.—Although Yale athletics have been generally suspended for a week because of the midyear scholarship examinations, four varsity and nearly a dozen class crews are working daily in the gymnasium tank. Coach Ed Leader today pointed out that no line-up or rowing order is permanent, although the first eight includes the veterans, Captain Gus Blagden and Sidney McCalmont. They are regarded as fixtures.

Leader has kept, since the squad reported for indoor work two weeks ago, Woodruff Tappen, varsity stroke two years ago, in that position. Arthur Palmer, who stroked the regulars in all their races last Spring, is still stroking the second eight, and it is impossible to predict the outcome of the keen rivalry of the pair. Each has stroked the regular eight to victory over Harvard in a four-mile race, and the varsity to victory over Princeton, Cornell and Pennsylvania in two-mile races.

Tappen stroked the first varsity eight all the Fall. Palmer was a lineman on the football eleven and has had only two weeks' rowing since the squad reported last September.

Walter Garnsey, No. 4 in the varsity eight last season, and William Mosle are in the second eight, Garnsey at No. 4 and Mosle at No. 3. He rowed bow in the first shell last Spring. James Gamble Rogers, who rowed No. 6 in the second shell last year, has been promoted to the same seat in the first boat, and J. R. Hunt, No. 2, has been placed at No. 4 in the first eight.

R. L. Goodale, No. 6 in the freshman eight, is the only 1932 class oarsman to be given a first varsity trial to date. He is seated at No. 2. Childs and Anthony, bow and No. 5 in the first eight, have been members of the interclass crews. Louis Ladd, who has had a season in both first and second varsity shells, has been kept in the fourth varsity eight since he reported with the oarsmen, following the football season. He was varsity lineman for the second time on the Yale eleven.

The make-up of the four varsity, the first freshman and the 150-pound varsity eights at present follows:

First Varsity—Bow, Anthony; No. 2, Goodale; No. 3, McCalmont; No. 4, Hunt; No. 5, Childs; No. 6, Rogers; No. 7, Blagden, captain; stroke, Tappen; coxswain, Gillespie.

Second Varsity—Bow, Storrs; No. 2, Manuel; No. 3, Mosle; No. 4, Garnsey; No. 5, Currie; No. 6, Goodbody; No. 7, Turner; stroke, Palmer; coxswain, Kitchel.

Third Varsity—Bow, J. Blagden; No. 2, Cussler; No. 3, Foster; No. 4, Littell; No. 5, Knott; No. 6, Brewster; No. 7, Parrish; stroke, Auchincloss; coxswain, Gillespie.

Fourth Varsity—Bow, Heyworth; No. 2, McCalmont; No. 3, Anthony; No. 4, Williams, No. 5, Magill; No. 6, Ladd; No. 7, Esselstyn; stroke, Sweet; coxswain, Conger.

150-Pound Varsity—Bow, Holter; No. 2, Brooks; No. 3, Smith; No. 4, Hefferan; No. 5, Dominick; No. 6, Van Schaik; No. 7, Bangs; stroke, Bowden.

Freshmen, First Eight—Bow, Urquhart; No. 2, Wikoff; No. 3, Vested; No. 4, Herrick; No. 5, Nimmo; No. 6, King; No. 7, Babcock; stroke, Shepard.

ALEKHINE ANNEXES 7TH GAME IN ITALY

Conquers Tartakower in Fifty Moves in San Remo Chess Play—Holds Two-Point Lead.

TWO ARE TIED FOR SECOND

Nimzowitsch and Rubinstein Win and Share Place—Ahues, Also a Victor, Is Fourth.

SAN REMO, Italy, Jan. 25.—By defeating his fellow townsman, Dr. S. Tartakower, in the eighth round today, Dr. Alexander Alekhine of Paris scored his seventh victory and and held his two-point lead in the international chess masters' tournament at the Municipal Casino. Dr. Tartakower dropped to a tie for fifth and sixth places, leaving Nimzowitsch of Denmark and Rubinstein of Poland, both of whom won, bracketed in second place. Ahues of Germany, also a winner, took fourth position. Once again seven decisive results were recorded and only one draw.

Dr. Tartakower, with the black pieces, adopted the Dutch defense against the queen's pawn opening selected by the world's champion. The latter sacrificed a pawn on his fifteenth move, recovering it nine moves later with the better position. Taking prompt advantage of a slight lapse on the part of his opponent, Dr. Alekhine won a pawn at his thirty-third turn, and then won in an interesting rook and pawn ending after fifty moves.

Nimzowitsch also captured a pawn from Araiza of Mexico in a queen's pawn opening and won handily in fifty-seven moves. Rubinstein was paired with Monticelli of Italy, who opened with the Zukertort. The Italian lost a piece in the middle game and resigned after thirty-six moves. Brilliant play on the part of Ahues, on the black side of a Ruy Lopez, gave the German master a victory over Spielmann of Austria in sixty-one moves.

Dr. Vidmar of Yugoslavia and Bogoljubow of Germany conducted an evenly contested queen's pawn opening to a draw in thirty-eight moves. The longest game of the day, which went to seventy-four moves, was a queen's pawn opening between Yates of England and Colle of Belgium. The winner was Colle, who had an advantage at adjournment. Later on he captured a piece and finally overcame the Englishman's resistance.

Maroczy of Hungary was in brilliant form and disposed of Romi of Italy in a queen's gambit lasting thirty-one moves. A hard fight between Kmoch of Austria and Grau of Argentina, a queen's pawn opening, resulted in favor of Kmoch in sixty-three moves after the Austrian had succeeded in annexing a pawn.

Yale Poloists Defeat Squadron A Team, 13½-7½; Penn Military College Wins

SQUADRON A TRIO IS BEATEN BY YALE

Fast Attack and Hard Hitting Keep Elis in Lead Throughout to Win, 13½-7½.

P. M. C. AGAIN IS VICTOR

Beats Peter Pan, 16-6, by Excellent Team-Work—Squadron A Team Turns Back Ramapo.

By ROBERT F. KELLEY.

The Yale trio defeated a Squadron A team last night at the Squadron A Armory by the score of 13½ to 7½. It was the final game of the evening and five members of Yale's varsity squad played alternating periods, with J. C. Rathborne, captain of the Old Aiken team, well known in outdoor polo, playing through the contest at back. Ahead of him Hardy Scott, J. D. Porter, Michael Phipps and Raymond Guest alternated.

The Yale poloists put on a fast attack by hard hitting that kept them pretty well in the lead throughout the game, though Squadron A stayed closely enough to make play interesting.

Pennsylvania Military College won again turning back the Peter Pan trio, 16 to 6, and continuing in second place with a record of four victories and one defeat. Winston Guest's Optimists have been the only team to defeat the college players in the metropolitan circuit competition.

Last night's game was to have put P. M. C. against Governors Island, but the fact that Lieutenant McDonald Jones was already a member of the Optimists prevented the entry of Governors Island and Peter Pan returned to action. With the nine-goal veteran, Archer Kinny, in action, Peter Pan fought hard and held its own in two periods, but heavy scoring by the collegians in the first and third periods, in each of which they tallied seven goals, carried the game for P. M. C. Four of the winners' first-period goals were theirs on handicap, but they never needed these goals and were pretty much in control throughout.

The team-work of the victors was excellent, but Bill Nicholls's fine play at back made him stand out. Kinny had several spots of brilliant stroking, but was not often backed up by his team-mates.

The evening opened with a Squadron A team defeating Ramapo, 14 to 6.

RIDING CLUB WINS IN BROOKLYN POLO

E. W. Hopping Stars as Class A Team Defeats Riding and Driving Trio, 20-10½.

J. PFLUG IS HIGH SCORER

No. 1 for Losing Outfit Tallies Eight Times—101st Cavalry Takes Preliminaries.

Three Riding and Driving Club teams were defeated at the 101st Cavalry Armory in Brooklyn last night. In the Class A game the Riding Club won by 20 to 10½. The Riding Club was aided by a nine-goal handicap, but aside from this it played splendid polo.

The principal factor in the victory was the remarkable hitting of Earle W. Hopping, the father of the young internationalist. It had been expected that both Hoppings would play for the Riding Club, but young Earle has left for California, where he will play with a team organized by George Moore.

The 101st Cavalry captured both of the preliminary games that featured the early evening's play.

The elder Hopping was an impenetrable wall on defense in the feature game and four times he came through to score. Johnny Pflug, at No. 1 for the Riding and Driving Club, in place of his brother, Carl, who is ill, carried on the family tradition splendidly by scoring eight times to lead both teams.

Successfully Defends 100-Yard Back Stroke Title in Union Temple Pool.

N. Y. A. C. WINS RELAY TEST

First Team of Fissler, Harms and Ray Ruddy Shows Way in 300-Yard Medley.

Miss Eleanor Holm of the Women's Swimming Association, and the New York A. C. medley relay team, gained conclusive victories in metropolitan A. A. U. senior championships conducted at a water carnival in the 75-foot pool of Union Temple, Brooklyn, last night.

Miss Hahn successfully defended her 100-yard back stroke crown in 1:14 2-5, again beating Miss Lisa Lindstrom's metropolitan record of 1:15, but missing her own recently established world's standard of 1:13 1-5, which has yet to be accepted.

The New York A. C. team, made up of George Fissler, back stroke, August Harms, breast stroke, and Raymond Ruddy, crawl, came through in the 300-yard medley title test in 3:13 3-5, five seconds behind the world's record time.

Opposes Her Clubmates.

Three members of her own club were the only contenders to oppose Miss Holm, and she defeated them easily, touching six yards ahead of Miss Adelaide Lambert, who led home by a narrow margin Miss Erna Kompa and Miss Margaret Decker, third and fourth as named.

Five teams reported for the relay medley and two heats were required. In the final two Mercury Foot trios outswam the field. The first team earned the verdict by more than ten yards from the second, composed of George Rowland, Julius Dolgos and Fred Scheel.

Brooklyn Central Third.

The Brooklyn Central Y. M. C. A. contingent—William Cunningham, Louis Meyer and Ted Brick—followed two yards back and secured third place from the Boys' Club trio.

LORD ABERDARE VICTOR IN CANADIAN RACQUETS

Wins Singles Title From Kemp-Welch by Default and With Latham Takes Doubles.

Special to The New York Times.

MONTREAL, Jan. 25.—The chances of the English team of racquet players triumphing in the United States championships next week were somewhat lessened when P. W. Kemp-Welch tore a ligament in his right arm while playing in the singles semi-final for the Canadian championship this morning.

Although he had his arm taped up tightly and tried to team with L. D. Cambridge in the doubles final in the afternoon, he was in such pain that the match had to be abandoned after the third game and Lord Aberdare and Dr. Latham were awarded the championship, as they were leading 2 to 1 at the time the game was called.

Kemp-Welch was also forced to default in the singles final to Lord Aberdare, so that the latter is now singles champion of Canada as well as doubles champion with Dr. Latham.

The summaries:

Singles.

Semi-Final Round—P. W. Kemp-Welch defeated Dr. Latham, 15—10, 17—15, 7—15, 15—11; Lord Aberdare defeated L. D. Cambridge, 15—9, 15—11, 18—13.

Doubles.

Lord Aberdare and Dr. Latham defeated Kemp-Welch and L. D. Cambridge, 8—15, 15—9, 15—12, game abandoned.

BOAT SHOW CLOSES WITH 2 NEW MARKS

By VERNON VAN NESS.

brings about not only lower prices but provides for improved services and storage facilities. Thousands of people yearly are finding the ideal recreation offered by boating and are turning to the water. We in the industry are able to offer water craft at prices within easy reach of any income.

Safety Factor Increased.

"Much has been done to increase the safety factor on the water, and we have now arrived at the point where boating may be thoroughly enjoyed by the most timid. The technical committee of the National Association of Engine and Boat Manufacturers is continuously cooperating with the motor boat engineers and we are proud to state that great strides have been made in speed, safety, standardization and comfort aboard the modern motor craft."

Probably the greatest interest in the entire show was among the smaller craft, including the outboards and the new inboards, a type of small runabout. In the outboard field the electric starter was the greatest single innovation, and manufacturers of outboard motors were a unit in declaring that this type of motor faced the greatest expansion in its history.

It is estimated by outboard manufacturers that there are upward of 350,000 outboard motors in existence at the present time. The production this year is expected to add 70,000 net to that number, accounting for replacements, &c. The sales in this particular type of motor this year were estimated at from 30 to 40 per cent over last year.

The new inboard boats, as the lighter and cheaper runabouts are called, were shown at the exposition for the first time this year and made an instant hit. They seem to have solved the problem of providing a family boat at a small cost. The Dodge Company, with the cheapest of these boats, while not announcing definite figures, declared that the sales of its small boat were most remarkable and presaged a much greater production for next year.

Sales to Other Countries.

The larger craft, both fast runabouts and the palatial cruisers, all brought forth unexpected attention. Nor were all of the sales confined to this country. Mexico, South America and even China went into the motor-boat market during the show and the Dodge Company reported the sale of one large runabout to a high government official of China, as well as the sale to prominent race drivers in this country.

Among the latter were Victor Kliesrath, winner of the Detroit Sweepstakes in 1927 and one of the best known drivers of big racing boats in the United States, who bought a 45-mile per hour 28-foot runabout with a 300-horsepower engine; Caleb Bragg, noted Gold Cup racer, who purchased the same kind of boat, and George H. Townsend of the Indian Harbor Yacht Club, who bought a sixteen-footer for his daughter, Virginia.

The Chris-Craft Company reported that in addition to doing a record business in the retail market at the show and accounting for a record agency and dealer sales, it had brought its total to $2,000,000 by including dealer commitments. The Gar Wood Company reported sales double those of last year at the show and found that 75 per cent of the increase was to new owners.

The Lyon Boat Company reported sales up 25 per cent and prospects 10 to 1 over last year. This was true also of Banfield, Dee Witte, Dart and a host of other builders specializing in runabouts, inboards, &c.

The Aeolian Company, in the field for the first year after a two-year preparatory period, reported sales far in excess of expectations and the promise of future business excellent. Its boat is a V-type runabout designed by George Crouch.

An index of the interest in outboard racing was to be had from all manufacturers of outboard motors. The season ahead, it is predicted, will be the most active in the history of this sport and the National Outboard Association has received applications for more regatta sanctions than ever before. The largest single sale of outboard motors was made yesterday when the Outboard Motor Corporation sold 600 engines to the E. J. Willis Company of this city. The purchase prices topped $120,000.

In the field of the larger craft Ludders reported heavy sales, as did the Matthews Company, Dawn, Elco, Millard, Brewster and Chambers, the Whitney Woodcraft Corporation, Consolidated Ship Building Corporation and Frederic P. Humphreys, Inc. American Car and Foundry and Hacker were other builders of the larger type boats to express keen pleasure at the result of the show.

Power Body Names Keator.

Frederick W. Keator of New Haven was elected chief commander of the U. S. Power Squadrons, Inc., at the annual meeting held at the New York A. C. last night.

Other officers chosen were Frederick L. Reid of Poughkeepsie, vice commander; Charles A. Morrell of Moore, Pa., rear commander; Benjamin S. Coe of Waterbury, Conn., secretary, and Herbert F. Christie of New York City, treasurer. Reid and Christie were re-elected.

HOPEFUL OF GOOD SEASON.

Lafayette Expects First Successful Wrestling Campaign.

EASTON, Pa., Jan. 25.—For the first time since wrestling was placed on the Lafayette sports calendar there is a promise of a successful season for the Maroon matmen. With victories over Rutgers and Temple, the only two starts this season, the wrestlers are looking forward to the four remaining meets on the schedule. Lehigh, Yale, C. C. N. HAVANA STAR RACES START ON THURSDAY

Record Fleet Will Compete in Mid-Winter Regatta for Cuba Trophy, Bacardi Cup.

OTHER EVENTS SCHEDULED

Roberts and Moore, Among Youngest to Take Part in International Contest, Entered.

By GROVER THEIS.

The eyes of yachting men in all waters of this country and many places abroad will be focused this week on Havana, where the annual midwinter regatta will start on Thursday with a record fleet of the famous International Star Class competing in several series of races. The series ends Feb. 7.

This is always one of the most picturesque events of the yachting year, with the radiantly colorful city of Havana as a background and the magnificent Malecon drive affording a natural amphitheatre, which is rare for a race among yachts.

Thirteen boats representing eleven fleets have been entered definitely and one of the most interesting aspects of the list of sailors is that two of the youngest yachtsmen ever to compete in an international contest will be among the competitors. They are David Roberts and Bassett Moore, 19 years old, of the Shelter Island Yacht Club, who will represent the Peconic and Gardiner's Bay fleet of Long Island Sound, sailing Jessica.

There will be three races for the Challenge Trophy of Cuba, three races for the Bacardi Cup, the annual team race between the United States and Cuba, and open races on the days of the championship series, starting later in the day. As an experiment this year two boats from each fleet will be admitted in the title series.

Colleen Won Both Events.

At the present time the Cuba Trophy and the Bacardi Cup both are held by the Pequot Yacht Club, F. T. Bedford's Colleen having won both events.

The fleets that will be represented this year are the Flota de la Habana, Western Long Island Sound, Gravesend Bay, Solent (England), Narragansett Bay, Bahia, Cienfuegos, New Orleans, Peconic-Gardiner's Bay, Flota de Paris, Massachusetts Bay, and Central Long Island Sound.

The open entries include Herkimer Atkins's Jubilee, Knapp and Weed's Peggywee, sailed by Newell P. Weed, and Dr. Pepper, sailed by John R. Robinson, all representing the Western Long Island Sound fleet.

The Solent entry marks the first time that England has been represented in a major Star Class title event. Colin Ratsey, with either his father or brother as crew for him, will be at the stick.

As usual the courses will be about eight miles, either triangular or windward and leeward, as occasion demands, and the sailors may get plenty of weather, considering previous records for this time of year. Last year, when the races were later, they ran into rather light weather. Under all circumstances there will be a good sea with the long ocean roll coming right to the Malecon.

The list of boats, fleets and crews in the championship, as available from the offices of George Elder, president of the I. S. C. Y. R. A., is as follows:

Coco, Flota de la Habana ....Allen Collazo
Catherine, Western Long Island Sound, F. W. Teves
Ace..........Adrian Iselin 2d, E. V. Willis
Lucky Lindy, Gravesend Bay, A. C. and N. J. Williams
Joy II, Solent (England)........Colin Ratsey
Sunbeam, Narraganset Bay..David Atwater
Lisa, Bahia, Gienfuegos.........F. Silvia Jr.
Chico, New Orleans..............D. Weuscher
Tempe III ....Not listed
Jessica, Peconic-Gardiner's Bay.Dave Roberts
Asa, Massachusetts Coast...Marcien Jenckes
Talita, Flota de Paris, E. J. Connill (probable)
Okla II, Central Long Island Sound, W. H. McHugh (indefinite)

Exodus of Star Sailors.

During the past week there has been quite an exodus of the ever ardent Star sailors and their boats on various boats headed for Havana. The Silver Jubilee Motor Boat Show, however, has dominated the marine activities to such an extent that little else received much mention from day to day, though the sailing men attended in large numbers. The most evident items pertain to the same Stars that will start racing in the Caribbean on Thursday.

One of these states that the association has purchased all of the rights to Star Class plans formerly owned by the designer William Gardner & Co. Complete sets of these layouts as well as of the sail plan of the new rig, recently adopted, are available from J. F. Watkins, secretary of the International Measurement Committee, 47 Manhattan Avenue, Bridgeport, Conn.

Another is that definite dates for the 1930 annual meeting and championship races, which will be under the auspices of the Chesapeake Bay fleet, have been set for Sept. 25 to Oct. 2.

In the realm of discussion remained the subject of steel masts for the contenders for the right to defend the America's Cup against Sir Thomas Lipton's challenge next Summer. It is known that every effort is being made to find a metal mast that is not too heavy.

It is reported on reliable authority that the syndicate that is paricularly active in experiments to provide a metal mast is the J. P. Morgan-George Nichols group, which is building the Weetamoe from designs by Clinton H. Crane.

The question of masts is admittedly one to which the cup committee is giving a great deal of attention, notice having been served already to the builders of the contenders to have a spare spar ready.

The masts will tower some 165 feet into the air and will be the tallest ever stepped into a pleasure or commercial yacht and will have to bear the terrific brunt of 7,550 square feet of sail. On a number of occasions in the past cup boats have been dismasted, resulting in delays as well as actual danger. That is why so much emphasis is being placed on them this year and is a clear indication of how interesting the development of metal masts might be.

HAINES GAINS FINAL IN JERSEY SQUASH

Defending Champion Eliminates Larigan, 12-15, 15-7, 15-12, 17-16, at Short Hills.

WILL OPPOSE WOLF TODAY

Challenger for Title Advances by Decisive Victory Over Kirkland, 15-2, 15-3, 18-15.

Special to The New York Times.

SHORT HILLS, N. J., Jan. 25.—Rowland B. Haines of the Columbia University Club, national amateur squash tennis champion, and Harry F. Wolf of the New York A. C. reached the final round of the New Jersey State championship today and will meet tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock for the title, which is now held by Haines.

In the semi-final today Haines defeated Edward R. Larigan of the Crescent A. C., runner-up in this tourney last year, after a terrific battle at 12—15, 15—7, 15—12, 17—16. Wolf advanced at the expense of his clubmate, R. Mason Kirkland, winning in decisive fashion at 15—2, 15—3, 18—15.

Larigan came within a point of beating Haines in the Clyde Martin Memorial tournament at the Yale Club a short time ago and the champion had his hands full to get by the hard-hitting Brooklyn star again.

Larigan found his best form at the start and except for the second game was always forcing Haines to his utmost. Had the Crescent ace won the fourth game, which he lost by only a point, there is no telling how the match would have ended.

Wolf, who gave Haines another terrific battle in the Yale tournament, leading him two sets to one and 13—11 in the fifth game, was always in command against Kirkland. The Montclair youth won as he pleased in the first two games and then let down in the third. This gave Kirkland the chance to get in some clever placements on corner shots and Wolf found it necessary to steel himself to the task again to prevent the play from going to a fourth game.

COLLETTE GOLF VICTOR; GETS A TRIP TO PARIS

Takes Play-Off in Artists and Writers Tourney at Palm Beach With Net of 74.

PALM BEACH, Fla., Jan. 25.—The third annual championship tournament of the Artists and Writers' Association was brought to a close today with the play-off of a three-cornered tie for the low net prize of a free round-trip to Paris, France. The winner was Maurice Collette of New York, who was deadlocked at 146 with E. Merrill Benjamin and Charles McAdam at the end of the regulation thirty-six-hole handicap competition.

Playing off over the country club course Collette had a card of 47—46—93, and his handicap of nineteen strokes gave him a net 74. Benjamin, who had an 88 for the qualifying eighteen holes, lapsed to 48—46—94 today. His allowance of seventeen strokes brought his tally down to 77. McAdam wound up with 50—45—95, handicap 16 and net 79.

Mrs. Pollard's Uluniu Takes Fair Grounds Feature; By Product Also Triumphs

ULUNIU HOME FIRST AT FAIR GROUNDS

Carries Mrs. Pollard's Colors to Victory Over Dowagiac—Calf Roper Is Third.

BY PRODUCT EASY VICTOR

Takes the Winter Garden Claiming, Beating Earl of Warwick—Eight Go to the Post.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 25.—Mrs. Roy Pollard's Uluniu annexed the feature race at the Fair Grounds today and in doing so turned the tables on Donnay from the Rancocas Stable, which had shown his heels to Uluniu on a previous time out.

In the race last Tuesday, Donnay was first and Uluniu third and the test was at six furlongs. And that race was through mud. Over a fast track this afternoon, and at a mile and a sixteenth, Donnay could not run with Uluniu and failed to even land in the money. Dowagiac from the Wild Rose Farm was second and the Three D. Stable's Calf Roper was third. Then finished Donnay and Wellet.

The winner carried the light impost of 105 pounds but Donnay was still more lightly weighted, having only 103 pounds up. Jockey J. Smith was in the saddle and did such a good job that he surprised the form players, his mount returning $15.60 for a $2 mutuel ticket.

The time of 1:45 1-5 was creditable enough considering that the track has been bad for several days past and was not at its best today even though rated as being fast.

The Winter Garden Claiming, fifth on the program, saw eight go to the post and C. B. Ramsey's By Product was returned the winner. She did not have too hard a time to take the measure of Earl of Warwick and Fred Jr., with Broad Axe, Bridegroom, Leyland, Wood River and Dabster finishing in the order named.

The Winter Garden was at a mile and an eighth and the result gave By Product her first victory in half a dozen starts at this track. Earl of Warwick also has had six chances at this course but he has yet to break the ice. Fred Jr. ran third last Monday in his only previous Fair Grounds start. By Product's time was 1:53 3-5.

Entries for Grand National Are 84; Last Year Were 121

Entries for the Grand National Steeplechase to be run at Aintree on March 28 number eighty-four, as against 121 last year. This decrease is due to the doubling of the entrance fee from £5 to £10. With a few exceptions the entries include all the best steeplechasers in training, notable absentees being Duke of Florence and Gib. Only nine of the eighty-four have ever completed the course of four miles and 856 yards, although thirty-four have already taken part in the race without having fallen. Gregalach, which won last year, is the only previous winner among the entries. Easter Hero, which was second last year, but which might have won had he not spread a plate, also is entered.

DETROIT BOXER DIES FOLLOWING KNOCKOUT

Darmon, Stopped by Koppy, Succumbs in Hospital Without Regaining Consciousness.

DETROIT, Jan. 25 (AP).—Mickey Darmon, 20, Detroit lightweight boxer, died at 4 A. M. today in Providence Hospital following a knockout in the Olympia ring last night at the hands of Eddie Koppy, also of Detroit.

Darmon, whose real name was Nicholas Darmand, did not regain consciousness after reaching the hospital. He was knocked out in the fifth round of a six-round fight by a right to the jaw.

Koppy, his manager, Charlie Moore; the referee, Sam Hennessey, and Doc Casey, Darmon's chief handler, were questioned by Van H. Ring, an assistant prosecuting attorney, after the fight but were not held. Ring, who was a spectator at the ringside, ruled that Darmon was the victim of a legitimate knockout.

In accordance with the rules of the State Boxing Commission Darmon was examined at weighing-in time by a physician and reported in good physical condition.

An inquest will be held into the death of Darmon. Authorities decided on the inquest after making an informal investigation through questioning of witnesses.

Darmon's death was attributed to a fractured skull, concussion of the brain and cerebral hemorrhages.

ALDARE WINS TITLE IN BOUT AT ARMORY

7,000 See Him Take Middleweight Championship From Nick Palmer, Former Holder.

Jackie Aldare of the 106th Infantry became the new National Guard middleweight champion when he defeated Nick Palmer, former titleholder of the home outfit in the twelve-round feature at the Fourteenth Regiment Armory in Brooklyn last night. A capacity crowd of 7,000 saw the former champion dropped for a six count in the third round. Aldare weighed 156½ while Palmer was one-half pound heavier.

In the eight round semi-final Paul Collins, 132, of the 106th Infantry gained the decision over Dick Scalza, 134, of the Twenty-seventh Division Trains while in another scheduled eight rounder Joe Salinas, 154, of the Fourteenth Regiment knocked out Art Lummy, also 154 and from the same outfit in the second session. Dinny Cronin, substituting for Johnny Fitzpatrick, 129, of the Thirteenth Coast Defense Artillery gained the verdict over Jimmy Barry, 128, of the home outfit in a six rounder. Jerry Porsioa, 133, of the Fourteenth Regiment boxed to a fast draw with Jackie O'Keefe, 138, of the Regular Army Fort Hamilton Base in the six-round curtain raiser.

OLEMAN SUNSHINE FIRST AT HAVANA

Mrs. Ramsey's Entry Dominates Fourth Race to Win With Speed to Spare.

WILLRAIN FINISHES SECOND

Rattle Comes In for Show Money—Gay Isabeau, the Favorite, Fails to Get a Place.

HAVANA, Jan. 25 (AP).—Oleman Sunshine didn't take long to return part of his purchase price which Mrs. K. Ramsey paid for him, when he won the fourth race in easy fashion over Willrain and Rattle today.

Oleman Sunshine was ridden by G. Riley, and dominated the running throughout. He was taken back for a breather in the back stretch, then drew away again under mild urging, winning with speed in reserve. He was recently purchased from J. P. White.

The start found Riley on the alert and he had Oleman Sunshine away on his toes. Willrain and Picador were along after him, while Clifton's Lass dwelt slightly, then ducked sideways. She recovered quickly and set after the leaders.

Gay Isabeau, which was installed as the choice, failed and the defeat can be ascribed to the shift in weights with which she met practically the same opposition in her last start. She changed hands in the running, going to the Highland Stable, which deposited a claim of $1,200 for her.

Water Fowl broke fast, but was crowded back going to the first turn. He closed with a rush. Colonel Crump was running strongly at the end. Donnaco was knocked back. Bright Flash was sharply shut off at the far turn.

Sun Broom broke slowly, was rushed up, followed the pace, but the early effort told and he tired at the end. Clean Play received a very poorly judged ride. He is a rapid breaker, but trailed far back. He is worth remembering. Queen Towton ran a good race.

WRITERS' DINNER SUNDAY

National League's Schedule Meeting Feb. 4 Is Final Phase of Winter Off Season.

By JOHN DREBINGER.

Following one final flurry of the Winter off season, the high lights of which will be the New York baseball writers' dinner and the National League's schedule meeting, sixteen major league ball clubs will embark on their annual migration into the Southland to prepare themselves as best they can for what promises to be another turbulent campaign.

The writers' dinner, which in recent years has become something of a fixture in bringing together practically all the notables in the baseball world, will be held next Sunday night in the grand ballroom of the Hotel Commodore.

Two days later, Feb. 4, the National League will conduct its annual Spring conclave, from custom still called a schedule meeting, though neither the magnates of the National nor the American League any longer have anything to do with the schedules beyond ratifying them. The two major league schedules are now drafted by the two league presidents, Ernest Barnard and John Heydler, and, though no official announcement has yet been made, it is understood the coming campaign will open on April 15 and close on Sept. 28.

February Meeting Discarded.

The American League, in fact, has long since discarded the custom of meeting in February. Instead, President Barnard now merely calls a session of his umpires, who this year will meet in Chicago on Feb. 11.

The National League, however, likes its meetings, regardless of whether there is anything important under advisement or not. So far as is known, the only matter of moment slated to come up will be a selection of a new umpire to succeed the veteran Bob Hart, who recently was elected city supervisor in Lowell, Mass., and plans to retire after twelve active seasons in the Heydler circuit.

In the event that nothing has yet happened to untangle the Brooklyn situation, it is possible but not probable that something may be done by the league at this meeting. At all events, it is certain the intiative will not be taken by President Heydler, who still painfully recalls his ill-fated venture last December when he marched the warring Brooklyn directors into the presence of Commissioner Landis. The Brooklyn directors hopped on this idea with great expedition and staged a furious battle right in the middle of Landis's suite.

In the meantime, preparations are moving along on all fronts for the general exodus South. As has been his custom in recent years, John McGraw will be among the first away from the barrier. The vanguard of the Giant squad will start for San Antonio on Feb. 12. Ten days later the Yanks will head for St. Petersburg and the Robins for Clearwater.

Ten Clubs Going to Florida.

Despite the fact that it lost some ground after the first rush of several years ago, Florida still leads the world in accommodating major league ball clubs during their periods of intensive Spring training. For a survey of the training camps shows that ten of the sixteen major league teams again will avail themselves of Florida's climatic advantages.

These teams include, besides the Yanks and Robins, the Braves, who also make St. Petersburg their headquarters; the Phillies, who will train at Winterhaven; the Reds at Orlando; the Cardinals at Bradenton; the Red Sox at Pensacola, the Athletics at Fort Myers; the Browns at West Palm Beach and the Tigers at Tampa.

The six remaining clubs have managed to scatter themselves over a considerable area. Besides the Giants, San Antonio also will play host to the White Sox this Spring, the Senators will be encamped at Biloxi, Miss., the Indians are again returning to New Orleans, while the Cubs and Pirates will once more disport themselves on the Pacific Coast, the Cubs on Catalina Island and the Pirates at Paso Robles.

DETAILS ARE ARRANGED FOR BENEFIT TOURNEY

Intercity Amateur Boxers to Meet in Garden Feb. 24 and 26 for Sports, Press Bays.

Details for the Metropolitan Association A. A. U. intercity boxing tournament to be held at Madison Square Garden on Monday, Feb. 24, and Wednesday, Feb. 26, for the benefit of the Sports Bay and Press Bay of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine were arranged last week at a meeting of officials.

Those present included President Herman Obertubessing, Vice President Martin A. Klein and Chairman Charles A. Elbert, representing the Metropolitan A. A. U., and Gilbert T. Hodges, vice chairman of the Cathedral Press Bay Fund, and Julian S. Myrick and Frederick W. Rubien, chairman and secretary, respectively, of the cathedral committee on sports games.

Announcement of the tournament has been met with enthusiasm by boxers, officials and followers of the sport and a large crowd is anticipated. The event will be an invitation and the best amateurs from out of town will be asked to compete with metropolitan champions. Those in charge of arrangements predict that it will be the most noteworthy amateur boxing carnival of the Winter.

MONTCLAIR, N. J., Jan. 25.—British lawn bowlers, who will arrive in this country on Monday to make a playing tour of the United States, including the annual competition for the Charles J. Hawaii School Five Seeks Bid To Chicago Court Tournament

Hawaii is likely to be represented in the twelfth annual national school basketball tournament of the University of Chicago, which will be held April 1 to 5. McKinley High School of Honolulu has sent in the first request for an invitation to the competition. The school, which has a student body of 2,500, has been the undefeated champion of the island for the past two years.

Every State except two, California and Rhole Island, has had teams in the tournaments in the past, but no high school outside of the mainland has been represented. Manager H. O. Crisler will extend an invitation to McKinley high to play if the team's early record is good. The eligibility rules for this year's tournament have been extended to permit the competition of all secondary schools, including academies, denominational and private schools, as well as high schools.

NEW ZEALAND LEADS IN CRICKET TEST

Closes First Innings Against England With 439 Runs at Wellington.

FINE BOWLING BY TOURISTS

Woolley With 28 Overs Gets 7 Wickets—Match to Be Resumed Tomorrow.

WELLINGTON, New Zealand, Jan. 25 (Canadian Press).—The New Zealand margin at the end of the first innings of the present test match, which started yesterday, may not be very great when England resumes on Monday.

The home team yesterday gave a masterly display of batting, scoring 339 runs for the loss of only three wickets. Today, however, the English bowling, especially that of the veteran Woolley, proved too good for the balance of New Zealand's batsmen and the innings closed for 439 runs.

England's first innings then opened and six wickets fell for 255 runs. While no batsman on the English side was outstanding, all except two turned in valuable efforts, running well over two figures. Steady displays by Dawson, Duleepsinjhi, Legge, Nichols and Worthington helped swell the visitors' figures.

Woolley, who bowled 28 overs against New Zealand, used an excellent length, and no fewer than seven of the ten wickets fell to him. Five of his overs were maidens, while only 76 runs were made from his offerings.

SINGER TO FIGHT LOAYZA ON FRIDAY

Bronx Lightweight and Chilean Scheduled for 10 Rounds in Feature at Garden.

CONRAD IN THE SEMI-FINAL

DeVos's Conqueror to Face Ebbets—Banovic Signed for Match on Feb. 7.

By JAMES P. DAWSON.

Al Singer, Bronx lad who is rapidly establishing himself as the successor to the position in pugilism once held by Benny Leonard, undertakes to move a step nearer a lightweight title match with Champion Sammy Mandell Friday night in Madison Square Garden, where he is to tackle Stanislaus Loayza, rugged Chilean lightweight, in a battle scheduled for ten rounds.

The contest has been arranged to replace a scheduled meeting between Singer and Christopher (Bat) Battalino, canceled when the featherweight champion was taken down in Philadelphia with an attack of blood poisoning. This, incidentally, is expected to cause a postponement of Battalino's proposed title match against Kid Chocolate, which is scheduled for March 10 in the Garden.

Singer and Loayza constitute a match which can reasonably be expected to provide satisfactory action. On form the Bronx lad, with his admirable command of the finer points of boxing, hitting accuracy and power, boxing speed and ability and resourcefulness under fire, figures to win.

A middleweight struggle of ten rounds between Doc Conrad, Newark conqueror of Rene DeVos, and Harry Ebbets, Freeport youngster, is billed as the semi-final. In the first ten-round event Dominick Volante, English boxer, will engage Louis Quadrini, Italian.

Joe Banovic, Binghamton's hard-hitting youngster, has been signed to battle Henry LaMar, Washington, D. C., heavy-weight, in one of the ten-round bouts preceding the Johnny Risko-Victorio Campolo heavyweight feature in the Garden on Feb. 7. Matchmaker Tom McArdle also has paired Vincent Serici and Stuffy McInnes, middleweights, for a ten-round bout on the Maxie Rosenbloom-Ace Hudkins card on Feb. 14, and Black Bill against Midget Wolgast, flyweights, in a ten-round bout on the Kid Chocolate-Al Ridgeway program scheduled for Feb. 21.

Gorilla Jones, Akron, Ohio, negro middleweight, returns to the local wars tomorrow night at the St. Nicholas Arena, where he is to battle the rugged Izzy Grove, Bronx lad, in the feature of ten rounds. The contest is a return engagement and has attracted unusual interest.

Matchmaker Joe McKenna has arranged a program of three six-round battles and five four-round events for the Uptown Lenox S. C. Tuesday night. The principals in the six-round matches will be: Victor Ferrand vs. Freddie Lattanzio, Frank Morris vs. Bruno Salo and Vic Morosco vs. Irish Harry Foy.

Johnny Krieger, Bay Ridge's promising young light-heavyweight, undertakes his most important ring battle Tuesday night at the New Broadway Arena, where he is to tackle Harry Smith, Harlem's hard-hitting negro middleweight. The contest is scheduled for ten rounds.

EBBETTS VICTOR IN BOUT.

Takes Feature Six-Round Event From Alis at Ridgewood Grove.

Harry Ebbetts, veteran Freeport middleweight, defeated Ricardo Alis of Spain in the feature six round bout at the new Ridgewood Grove last night before a crowd of 3,000 persons. Ebbetts weighed 167 and Alis 158.

In the six-round semi-final, Martin Oroz, 141, of Spain and Dino Tempesti, 143, of Italy fought to a draw.

Sig Hoiseth, 169, Norway, pounded out a decision over Herman Riegel, also 169, Ridgewood, in six rounds. Riegel was floored for a count of nine in the second round.

Joe Moresco, 145, Orange, gained the verdict over Sonny Martin, 141, Bay Ridge, in the other six-rounder.

Benny Flax, Bushwick welterweight, received the decision over Eddie Carn, Porto Rico, in the first of the four rounders. Sid Silas, 128½, South Brooklyn, and Jerry Velardi, 126½, Sacramento, battled to a draw decision.

In the remaining fours, Billy Karlin, 130½, Bushwick, knocked out Patsy Ferrara, 135½, east side, in 0:23 of the first round and Jimmy Amber, 158, South Brooklyn, stopped Frank Biangosho, 154½, Long Island City, in 2:11 of the first round.

Soccer Giants Bow to Hakoah

HAKOAH TURNS BACK GIANTS ELEVEN, 4-2

National Champions Triumph at Hawthorne Field After Trailing, 2-0, at Half.

LOSERS USE NINE PLAYERS

Are Two Short Most of the Final Period Because of Referee's Rulings—Wortman Stars.

With a good chance to dislodge Providence from fourth place in the Atlantic Coast Soccer League, the New York Hakoah eleven made up ground at Hawthorne Field yesterday by winning from the New York Giants, 4 goals to 2.

The Giants, who follow Hakoah in the league table, were unfortunate in being compelled to play with only nine men during the greater part of the second half, but gave the national champions a great battle and did not give up until the final whistle. At half time the score stood at 2 goals to 0 in favor of the Giants. Midway in the first period Jock Brown, in goal for the Giants, and Grenfeld of Hakoah had a dispute which resulted in the referee ordering both from the field for the remainder of the game.

Jim Brown and Davie Brown scored the goals for the Giants within the last five minutes of half time for the Giants, while Wortman started the scoring for Hakoah ten minutes after the restart. He scored one more goal, while Neufeld and Nicholsburger netted the other tallies. Both teams were even in corners, with six apiece. The attendance was 1,500.

Play in Hakoah Territory.

The Giants started pressing as soon as the whistle blew and with the sun and wind in their favor, play was kept in Hakoah territory, but it was not until the half was almost over that any counts were registered. When Jock Brown and Grenfeld were ordered from the field, Hyslop moved into goal from his position at left halfback. Fischer took a bad tumble in making a save, but he continued to play.

Five minutes from half time, Jim Brown scored the first goal when he headed in a corner from Moorhouse. Two minutes later Davie Brown made it 2-0 in favor of the Giants.

About seven minutes after the interval, the Giants were deprived of the services of Jim Brown at outside right, when he was ordered from the field for hitting Mahrer.

From then on the Giants played with nine men and against the wind. At ten minutes, Lyell tried to put the Giants further in the lead, but Fischer was right on the spot and saved. Nicholsburger then got the ball, crossing to Wortman, who reduced the lead.

Neufeld Evens the Score.

Encouraged by this, Hakoah started pressing, but it was another twenty-five minutes before it evened the score. Wortman made another try for goal which Hyslop saved, but Neufeld got the ball on the rebound and made it 2-2. Almost immediately Nicholsburger sent in a sizzler, and with three minutes to go Wortman, with an assist by Neufeld, made it 4-2 in favor of Hakoah.

The line-up:

Hakoah (4).		Giants (2).

American Kennel Club Postpones The Erection of Its Own Building

Quest of Suitable Structure Will Be Continued, However—Indications Are That Westminster Show Next Month Will See Record Number of 2,600 Dogs Benched.

By HENRY R. ILSLEY.

For the present, at least, plans for a separate and permanent home for the American Kennel Club are in statu quo. In other words, no immediate attempt will be made to buy property and erect a new building and headquarters are likely to remain for some time at the present Fourth Avenue address.

Some time ago a building committee was appointed to look into the whole subject and recently a somewhat ambitious and extensive report was made. This was carefully considered by the executive committee, which eventually decided that the time is not ripe for the organization to embark upon an extensive building program involving large expenditures and a vast amount of detail. The report, therefore, was resubmitted to the building committee with the request to continue looking for a suitable building.

It is hoped, however, that in due time the scheme may develop successfully. It is the idea of the executive committee that a suitable building may be found in a central location, which may be altered to meet present requirements and afford opportunities for subsequent expansion.

Social Club Projected.

One of the features of such a plan is the formation of a social club composed of dog fanciers from all over the country, with an active membership drawn from Eastern enthusiasts and an associate membership, with nominal dues for members from the more remote sections. The latter would thereby have a permanent headquarters during visits to the metropolis. There is such a club in existence in London and it is understood that it has been most successful in providing a meeting place for fanciers from all over Great Britain.

The projected social organization naturally would have restaurant facilities and, if developed along the lines of existing clubs, would provide rooms for out-of-town members and their guests. There would be rooms for meetings of specialty and other clubs, library and all the other conveniences of a first-class club. The difficulty to date—and the same project was envisaged some twoscore years ago—has been to find some one person or group with the time and initiative to attend to organization details. It would be something quite apart from the American Kennel Club, with which it would have no official connection.

That such a social club, housed under the same roof as the governing body, would be a good thing for all concerned is generally conceded. It would place fanciers from remote sections in closer touch with official kennel affairs and would provide them with all the facilities at the disposition of the A. K. C. There would be a close bond between individuals and a deeper interest in all matters pertaining to the dog. It is to be hoped that the dream will come true at no distant date.

Entry of 2,600 Dogs Awaited.

There is every indication that the Westminster Kennel Club next month will put on the greatest dog show that has ever been held in any country, with the astonishing number of approximately 2,600 dogs on the benches. What this figure means is shown by a comparison with last year's figures, when the total of 2,412 dogs constituted a record up to that time.

Additional entries piled in all last week at the Fourth Avenue headquarters of the club and will be received up to tomorrow, when the lists positively will have to be closed in order to get the catalogue on the press. These belated entries have come from some of the leading kennels of the country and the week-end deluge probably will help to swell the totals in dozens of breeds to new record figures.

Some of the breeds have made surprising gains over last year. Bull terriers, for instance, have nearly doubled and already 80 dogs have been entered. Lady Kitty Ritson, who is coming from England to judge the shepherd dogs, already has drawn an entry of 130 individual dogs—50 more than last year and enough to make a big specialty show. Great Danes already are only ten dogs short of an even hundred.

A number of the terrier breeds are coming back very strongly, notably the Irish, which have seventy-five dogs entered today. There will be a grand array of Scotties, and the 111 dogs named to date assures a new record for an American show. Dandie Dinmonts, seldom seen nowadays, are coming back, with fourteen dogs entered. There will even be eight Skye terriers shown, with well over half a hundred Airedales and new records in several other terrier breeds.

Every once in a while the dachshund fanciers push their breed to the fore. Last year only eight were benched, while this year to date thirty-one specimens have been entered. Next month there will be shown the greatest collection of springer spaniels ever benched in the United States, the figures to date totaling fifty. Irish wolfhounds already have the unprecedented number of twenty-eight dogs in the entry list, and figures all along the line show the most unexpected increases.

Northern Breeds Popular.

Northern breeds are slowly, but none the less surely, establishing themselves in the public fancy. Newfoundlands, a common sight a generation and more ago in the Eastern part of this country, but more generally popular in England of late years, again are entrenching themselves. Due to the untiring efforts of the enthusiasts of the Samoyede Club, this grand white dog is making rapid strides everywhere in this country, as well as in England.

Intelligence, affection, rare courage and amenability to training and discipline mark these Northern breeds, and among them is the Norwegian elkhound, which deserves to be far better known in this country. He combines ruggedness with refinement, is bold, powerful and energetic, displaying endurance rather than extreme speed. As a companion he is the peer of any dog—brainy, sensitive, responsive and tenacious in his affections.

Heika av Glitre, owned by the Vindsval Kennels of Bayard Boyesen of Richmond, N. H., has been imported from Norway by his owner. He has had a remarkable show record on this side of the water and his offspring never have been defeated for best American-bred. Mr. Boyesen has imported many other noted elkhounds, famous winners abroad and mighty hunters, but considers Heika the nearest to perfection in the breed.

Many Handlers Applying.

Applications for handlers' licenses are now being received in large numbers by the American Kennel Club. During the off weeks of the Winter season the professionals were very busy getting their charges in shape for the various specialty shows and the big all-breed events of next month, and deferred putting in their applications until the eleventh hour.

And this is a reminder that the first specialty show of the year comes the last two days of this week. For its seventeenth annual exhibition the Maryland Kennel Club has received a record-breaking entry of more than 700 dogs. The show will be held Friday and Saturday in the Fifth Regiment Armory, Baltimore.

While the entry lists for the annual specialty show of the American Pomeranian Club closed yesterday offically, they will be held open until tomorrow night for the late comers, and indications are that the exhibition will be up to the standard of former years in number and quality. The event will be staged this year in the Hotel McAlpin on Friday, Feb. 7, and will be the first of a galaxy of specialty events that will immediately precede Westminster's opening.

The following day will come the specialty shows of the Airedale Terrier Club of America and the Irish Terrier Club of America, both of which will be held in the Hotel New Yorker on Saturday, Feb. 8. Entries for both of these events will close tomorrow, and judging from the early entry for Westminster in both of these breeds their respective specialty shows undoubtedly will be the most notable ever held on this side.

Entries also close tomorrow for the three specialty shows on Sunday, Feb. 9, which will keep the fanciers on the jump. They are the Chow Chow Club at the McAlpin and the American Fox Terrier Club and the American Sealyham Terrier Club at the Pennsylvania Hotel.

Exhibitors should not forget that next Friday, Jan. 31, is the last day for getting entries in for the Eastern Dog Club show in Boston on Feb. 20-22.

PLANS 52 NEW SHIPS IN 5-YEAR PROGRAM

Shipping Board Sees Building of $235,000,000 in Vessels Under Marine Act.

500% INCREASE IN DECADE

671 Boats of 3,865,000 Gross Tons Now in Merchant Fleet and Vast Trade Gain Is Noted.

The United States Shipping Board estimates that the nation's shipbuilding program for the next five years, as now projected, involves the construction of fifty-two vessels of a gross tonnage of 604,500 and an approximate cost of $235,000,000. These ships will be built under the terms of the merchant marine act of 1928, based on the Jones-White bill. Loans will be granted by the government at a low rate of interest and the ships will be built to conform to government standards.

The Merchant Marine Bulletin lists the five-year program of "vessels built, building and proposed" under provisions of the act, with the companies involved, the number of vessels proposed by each and the gross tonnage of the vessels, as follows:

American Export Line	8	80,000
Panama Pacific Line	[illegible]	[illegible]
Grace Line	[illegible]	[illegible]
Dollar Line	[illegible]	[illegible]
Matson Line	[illegible]	[illegible]
Motor Tankship Corporation	[illegible]	[illegible]
Munson Line	[illegible]	[illegible]
Ward Line	[illegible]	[illegible]
United States Lines	[illegible]	[illegible]
Roosevelt Line	[illegible]	[illegible]
United Fruit Line	[illegible]	[illegible]
Colombian Line	[illegible]	[illegible]
Mississippi Shipping Company	[illegible]	[illegible]
Lykes Brothers-Ripley Company	[illegible]	[illegible]

The shipbuilding program will continue to change as the Shipping Board, the Postoffice Department and the interdepartmental committee which was appointed by President Hoover to help formulate a policy agree on such details of government aid as shall be decided upon. Admiral H. I. Cone, a commissioner of the Shipping Board, in a statement accompanying the table prepared by the board, says:

500 Per Cent Increase.

"At the present time the ocean-going American merchant fleet employed in established lines in foreign and non-contiguous trades consists of 671 vessels of 3,865,000 gross tons. This shows a 500 per cent increase in tonnage and nearly 550 per cent in number since 1914. With few exceptions these are of 2,000 gross tons and over, and 60 per cent of the number and 65 per cent of the gross tonnage are now under private ownership.

"It is a certainty, however, that without the strong support of the government our merchant marine would have reverted to the humiliating, and, from the standpoint of the nation's welfare and security, economically unsound position it occupied before the war.

"As a result of the merchant marine act of 1928, contracts have been awarded for the building of seventeen new vessels, totaling nearly 270,000 gross tons. Plans will be under way shortly for the building of additional vessels to make a total of about fifty-two ships, valued at approximately $235,000,000, most of which will be built within five years. These ships will be of the most modern types and comparable to any in the world."

Commissioner Sandberg referred to the policy of the government at the close of the war as the means of saving the American marine from falling into an economically unsound position. The Shipping Board has opened fifty-two passenger and cargo services, and by consolidations and sales to private American operators the lines have been disposed of until there are now only eighteen cargo lines remaining under the supervision of the board.

Views Rise in Ten Years.

It is expected that this total will soon be reduced, as two of the outstanding lines, the America France and American Diamond Lines, are being sought by private operators. The government fleet has been reduced, Mr. Sandberg pointed out, to 486 ships of 2,657,000 gross tons and of these 230 ships of 1,472,000 gross tons are in active operation. During the past ten years the proportion of American commerce carried in American ships has risen to 36 per cent from 10 per cent in the ten years prior to 1914.

The gain is more important in view of the fact that the foreign water-borne commerce of the United States for the past ten years has averaged $2,000,000,000, as against an average of $[illegible] for the decade prior to 1914, Mr. Sandberg said. He cites the growth of American flag services in competition with foreign ships, as follows:

"In 1914 there were engaged in the European trade six American flag ships of approximately 70,000 gross tons. Today 233 American flag vessels of nearly 1,500,000 gross tons are employed in the European trade.

"There were five American ships of about 23,000 gross tons engaged in the trade between the United States and South America. Today we have 90 ships of 550,000 tons in the same trade. We had one line operating five ships of 50,000 tons from Pacific coast ports under the American flag. Today we have 140 ships of 1,000,000 tons. In 1914 we had no services to the African Continent. Today we have 22 ships of 125,000 tons.

"The trade of these areas shows a marked expansion over the pre-war period. The increase with Europe over 1914 amounts to 50 per cent, with South America 200 per cent, with Africa 325 per cent, and with Asia 380 per cent."

The itinerary will include stops at Fishguard, Killarney, Limerick, Ennis, Galway, Leenane, Westport, Mallaranny, Sligo, Carrick, Londonderry, Belfast, Dublin, Glendalough and Wexford. PUBLISHERS INSPECT NEWSPRINT CARRIER

Hold Luncheon on the Markland Here on First Trip From Canadian Paper Mills.

A group of representatives of New York newspapers were guests yesterday of Colonel C. H. L. Jones, president of the Mersey Paper Company of Liverpool, N. S., on the company's new paper-carrying steamer Markland, docked at the foot of West Twelfth Street. More than a score of executives of New York organizations attended the luncheon, which marked the Markland's first trip here.

The steamer was built in Hull, England, and will be used exclusively to carry newsprint to New York from the new Nova Scotia mills of the Mersey Company. It arrived on Friday with the first cargo of 4,200 tons of paper for New York newspapers.

Colonel Jones said that the Markland would make the voyage from Nova Scotia in forty-eight hours and would be able to make thirty trips during the season. The output of the new mills is 250 tons per day and will be increased gradually to meet the demand in New York City.

The Markland, constructed specially for carrying newsprint, has smooth, box-like holds, with no projecting obstructions which might harm the rolls in transportation. Knee-joints and stanchions usually built within the ship are placed on the deck and other outside parts of the vessel to leave the hulls perfectly clear for storage.

Among those who attended the luncheon were Walter H. Bell, New York representative of the Mersey Company; Howard Davis, George F. Hufuagel and A. M. Burns of The Herald Tribune company; John D. Collins, A. F. Gladfelder, W. F. Christopher and A. D. Hurley of the Hearst newspapers; W. G. Chandler of the Scripps-Howard interests and H. G. Blackstone and J. F. Butler of the Furness Withy Company, agents in New York for the Mersey Shipping Company.

WOULD EASE LOANS FOR SHIPBUILDING

Bill Reported to House Extends Low Interest Provision to Construction Period.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 25.—A bill to provide for the lowest government interest rate on funds advanced to ship owners during the course of construction of vessels for foreign trade was reported for passage today by the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

This bill was introduced by Representative Free, Republican, of California, as a further attempt to clarify the merchant marine act. Under the act the lowest government rate is applicable to vessels actually in foreign service in competition with ships of other countries. The rate applicable to vessels in coastwise trade is fixed by the act at not less than 5¼ per cent, but the rate is often down to 3½ per cent on loans for vessels in foreign trade.

Under the Shipping Board's interpretation of the act a vessel is considered in foreign trade only when it is actually sailing the seas and making foreign ports. It has held that during the process of construction, equipping, reconditioning or repairs the vessel is out of foreign service and in fact coastwise.

The Free bill would require a vessel to spend nine months of each year in foreign service in order to enjoy the lowest rate. An amendment to the bill in committee making the act applicable to ships already under construction, it was estimated, would save for two companies with four vessels already laid down about $100,000 a ship.

FREIGHTER GOES ON SHOAL.

Danish Boat, Refloated, Awaits Tow Off Cape Hatteras.

NORFOLK, Va., Jan. 25 (AP).—The Danish freighter Martin Carl went aground in thick weather this morning on Diamond Shoals on the Carolina coast, but floated herself early this afternoon.

The stranding rendered the ship helpless and she was forced to await a tow. The Coast Guard cutter Mendota will take the Martin Carl in tow near Cape Hatteras about daylight tomorrow and is expected to arrive here about midnight.

The Martin Carl was bound from Cuba to New York with 15,000 bags of sugar.

THE WEATHER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 25.—The northern disturbance has moved eastward to the Eastern Canadian Provinces and Northern New England, and pressure remains low from Hudson Bay eastward and northeastward over the Greenland-Iceland area. Minor disturbances are centred over Northwestern North Dakota and off the coast of Washington, and both are moving southeastward. Still another disturbance has developed over the far Southwest, being centred tonight over the southern plateau region.

Pressure is high over the eastern half of the United States, except the North Atlantic States, and it remains high from Alaska southwestward to Idaho and Western Montana.

Fair weather will prevail almost generally east of the Mississippi River Sunday, but the eastward advance of the southern plateau disturbance will be attended by increasing cloudiness on Monday, and precipitation is probable by Monday night as far east as the lower lake region, the upper Ohio Valley and the southern Appalachian region.

The temperature will be lower in the Middle Atlantic and North Atlantic States and the Northern Appalachian region Sunday, but it will rise slowly in Western Ohio Sunday and quite generally in the Eastern and Southeastern States during Monday.

SUCCESSFUL YEAR FOR COOPERATIVES

Stock Market Slump Had Negligible Effect Upon Apartment Ownership.

UPKEEP COSTS MODERATE

Manhattan Has 146 Cooperative Buildings and Several New Ones Under Construction.

Reviewing the cooperative house activity for the past year and outlining its prospects for the coming season, Henry Forster, manager of the residential department of Brown, Wheelock: Harris, Vought & Co., states that a recent survey by that firm showed that there were at the close of 1929 a total of 146 cooperative apartment structures completed and available for occupancy in Manhattan Island; of these forty were partially cooperative and 106 were 100 per cent cooperative.

The great majority of these buildings are on the east side, numbering 128, representing a total investment in land and buildings of $204,700,000, while the west side contains eighteen cooperatives, aggregating an investment of $16,575,000.

"One frequently hears the statement," says Mr. Forster, "from those not familiar with cooperatives, that estimates of maintenance charges are always too low—that after a purchaser moves in to his apartment he finds his maintenance greatly in excess of what he was led to expect. While I know in only a general way the situation in the buildings of other agents, our own record in this respect is interesting.

Excellent Cost Record.

"Of twenty-three comparable buildings, all completed within the last six years, nineteen are using the original booklet budget total, two have reduced their budgets and two have increased them slightly. This is an enviable record and shows, first, great care and conservatism in preparing the figures printed in each original prospectus, and secondly, careful management after completion of the various buildings, particularly where increasing costs of labor and materials must be considered.

"Were it not for the impossibility of gauging accurately the amount of real estate taxes, the records on these twenty-three buildings would be even better. When real estate taxes increase, though it may mean higher maintenance for a tenant-owner, it also is conclusive proof of an increase in value of the land and building and hence an increase in value of the tenant-owner's apartment.

"Many cooperative buildings reduce their mortgages regularly through amortization or set up sinking funds for future reductions. The twenty-three buildings considered here have a total accumulated surplus and amortization of $933,000, equal to over 5 per cent premium on the stock of the corporations represented. Such far-sighted financial policy will mean much to the tenant owners of these corporations in the future.

"To me the high point of interest of last year's cooperative market was the failure of the Stock Market slump to cause forced sales of cooperatives. In our thirty-one cooperative buildings not a single apartment was forced on the market for resale at a sacrifice.

Investment Security.

"The man who owns a cooperative apartment is looked upon as a substantial citizen and the fact that he has not been compelled to sell proves that he is one. He belongs to the class to whom home ownership means comfort in living and freedom from financial worry. Many an apartment owner is congratulating himself that because of his investment in a home he not only did not lose as much in the stock market as he otherwise might have done, but has a comfortable place to live at far less than current rent values.

"The investor today is more concerned with security than anything else—far more than he was a few months ago when the speculative fever was high. For at least part of his funds, he will turn to real estate, the basic security. If he doesn't own his own home, he will see the wisdom of providing this safeguard for the future of his family. The stock of the corporation owning any well located cooperative apartment building will fit into his scheme of investment, and provide safety and protection, as well as any other well located real estate.

"A substantial number of new 100 per cent cooperative buildings is now being erected, for completion next Summer. Most of them are well conceived, intelligently planned, soundly financed. Many of them are already 15 per cent to 20 per cent sold. People are convinced of the underlying soundness of fundamental conditions. Resales in most cases are at substantial advances over the original cost. The selling market is active and getting better. Cooperative ownership is past the experimental stage and has proved its soundness."

INCREASING DEMAND FOR MIDTOWN REALTY

Substantial Growth Will Be a Marked Feature of the Year, Says S. G. Rosenthal.

A slow, steady, substantial growth, based upon inherent strength and sound values, will characterize the metropolitan real estate market for 1930, according to S. G. Rosenthal, president of Adams & Co.

"During the hectic months that preceded the stock market crash of 1929 New York realty had been relegated to the rôle of a Cinderella, ignored by the capitalist and neglected by the investor," said Mr. Rosenthal. "Small wonder that capital strayed away from realty and wandered down to Wall Street.

"Today the situation is changed. Call money is down to a comparatively unattractive level. Investors, both large and small, are seeking some safer, surer channel for the investment of surplus funds, and realty may again come into its own.

"Midtown realty, in particular, occupies a very favorable position. Among the major movements that are destined to make for a substantial development in that field are:

"The steady, natural growth of the garment centre.

"The mounting importance of the Grand Central zone, especially that portion of it east of Third Avenue.

"The mammoth building operations on Fifth Avenue in the thirties.

"The projected new railroad terminal in the Gramercy district."

REALTY EXCHANGE ORGANIZES FOR YEAR

Charles G. Edwards Announces Official Family to Conduct Policy of Securities Market.

The executive committee of the board of governors of the New York Real Estate Securities Exchange was announced yesterday by Charles G. Edwards, newly elected president of the Exchange. Mr. Edwards announced that plans were well under way to further the growth in usefulness of the Exchange during 1930.

The committee, which will meet twice a month with Mr. Edwards to discuss major policies, will consist of Douglas L. Elliman, vice president; Morton R. Cross, treasurer; Anton L. Trunk, secretary; Lewis H. May, Joseph C. Hoagland and Peter Grimm. Mr. Grimm, who is president of the Real Estate Board of New York, was, until the recent meeting of the board of governors of the Exchange, chairman of that body, but at his own request the chairmanship has been left unfilled so that the Exchange may function with a single executive head.

Mr. Edwards, who has been in the real estate business in New York for thirty years, was, for several years, president of the Real Estate Board of New York, and, for a time, headed the National Association of Real Estate Boards. He said that he expected to devote some time to explaining to communities outside of New York the value of the Exchange as the first open market in the world devoted exclusively to real estate securities.

Upon taking office, Mr. Edwards said: "I will attempt nothing spectacular, but intend to guide the Exchange in sound and gradual growth.

The new board of governors, selected at the first annual election a few days ago, are J. Clarence Davies, Douglas L. Elliman, Joseph C. Hoagland, Lewis H. May, Laurence McGuire, Cyrus C. Miller, Aaron Rabinowitz, William H. Class, Edward F. Coombs, Morton R. Cross, Louis B. Dailey, Peter Grimm, Anton L. Trunk, Frederic L. Yeager, Louis W. Abrons, John Nelson Cole, J. Clydesdale Cushman, Robert E. Dowling, Charles G. Edwards, Frank E. Gernon and Robert E. Simon.

Besides electing a new board of governors at the first annual meeting, the members appointed Cyrus C. Miller, who was the first president of the Exchange, to serve as its counsel, and named Harold J. Treanor as associate counsel.

MORE than a dozen high-class apartment house structures are now under construction in the west side home area between Sixty-sixth and 108th Streets and this does not include the largest individual residential edifice, the new hotel of forty stories or more to be erected on the site of the old Majestic on the Central Park West block front between Seventy-first and Seventy-second Streets by the Chanin Brothers. The apartment houses in the class mentioned will all be fifteen stories in height or more.

Practically all of these apartment structures will be ready for occupancy early in the Fall, and very satisfactory rentals are now being made from plans. In this respect these newer west side houses, especially those facing Central Park, are duplicating the east side rental methods which have prevailed there for several years in renting from the architects' plans several months before completion.

Realty brokers on the west side who have had the management of some of the new houses opened last Fall reported before the close of the past year that rentals of the higher grade suites in that part of the city had never before been so satisfactory. In proportion to the number of high-class houses completed in various centres of the city, the west side, from about Fifty-ninth to 110th Street, was the best rented apartment house section in Manhattan at the close of the Fall season. It is highly interesting to note that statistics seem to bear out a recent survey that of the major operations completed there last season—some eighteen to twenty tall buildings—the percentage of vacancies at the present time is less than 2½ per cent.

Splendid Rental Received.

"These rentals in the newer and more expensive houses," said E. R. Stix, of the firm of L. J. Phillips & Co., "have not been made with any material loss in the older houses. The latter, if well kept up—and the great majority are—are also very well rented. Some of the new houses are fully occupied.

"The popular thoroughfare for those able to take the best apartments is Central Park West. A few years ago it was West End Avenue. The latter has lost nothing in popular prestige, but with the completion of the subway work a new era has opened for the broad avenue facing the park, and within a very short time it will equal, both in type and elegance of its structures, the row of apartments on the opposite Fifth Avenue side."

The largest operation on Central Park West last year was the completion of the Beresford, between Eighty-first and Eighty-second Streets. Three or four other block fronts were also improved with new houses, and at the present time six multi-family operations are under way on Central Park West of which four will occupy block fronts. One of these is the new Hotel Majestic. The others are eighteen-story apartment edifices on the block fronts respectively between Seventieth and Seventy-first Streets, Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Streets and Ninetieth and Ninety-first Streets. The last two will have towers on either wing rising to a height of twenty-eight stories. Of the other two park-front operations, one covers about three-quarters of a block at the south corner of Sixty-sixth Street and the other is on the north corner of 104th Street.

Facing Central Park.

The tall house under way between Seventieth and Seventy-first Streets is being erected by the Bricken Construction Company and will be known as 101 Central Park West. An increase in the number of terraces usually found in large apartments is noted in the plans of Schwartz & Gross. With a greater height on a smaller percentage of the total area, a more interesting variety of suites is possible, according to Pease & Elliman, agents. Above the ground floor there will be ninety-three apartments. From the second to the ninth floors suites will be from six to nine rooms. Three tower floors above the fourteenth story will provide apartments of six, eight, ten and fourteen rooms, simplex and duplex.

The new San Remo, replacing the old hotel by that name, will be ready for October occupancy on the block front between Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Streets. It has been designed to be one of the best residential houses in the west side and it is interesting to note that Nathan Straus, long a west side resident, has just leased from the plans a suite of ten rooms in the new San Remo. L. J. Phillips & Co., rental agents for the house, closed the lease. That firm sold to Mr. Straus in 1894 the property at 27 West Seventy-second Street, upon which he built his town house. Thirty years later, in 1924, they sold the property to a building corporation and it became part of the site of the Hotel Olcott.

The apartment building of similar size on the block front between Ninetieth and Ninety-first Streets occupies the site of the old Eldorado houses.

On Amsterdam Avenue.

Additional high-class improvements will be seen on Amsterdam Avenue toward the end of the year. Two large houses are going up there on the southeast corner of Seventy-ninth Street and the southwest corner of 108th Street, respectively. The new Seventy-ninth Street house will adjoin a similar building on the Seventy-eighth Street corner, and on the northwest corner of Seventy-seventh Street the sixteen-story Marlborough apartment was completed and opened last Fall.

The Seventy-second Street block between Central Park West and Columbus Avenue, now almost entirely given over to tall structures, will see another large edifice finished this year at 49 West Seventy-second Street, adjoining the northeast corner of Columbus Avenue.

Other fine apartment buildings under way or nearing completion are at 50 Riverside Drive, north corner of Seventy-seventh Street; 15 West Eighty-first Street, between the park and Columbus Avenue; 12 West Ninety-sixth Street and on the north side of Ninety-second Street, both between the park and Columbus Avenue; 119 West Ninety-sixth Street, between Columbus and Amsterdam Avenues, and on the southwest corner of Manhattan Avenue and 106th Street.

GIGANTIC OPERATION IN CHELSEA PROJECT

Could Build City With Materials Needed for London Terrace Apartments.

Building materials sufficient to erect an average city of 25,000 inhabitants will be required in completing the London Terrace apartment house group on the block bounded by Ninth and Tenth Avenues, Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Streets. The block contains practically 160,000 square feet, according to the Henry Mandel Companies, developers of the plot, and twelve residential buildings are to be erected there.

For the first ten apartment buildings which are scheduled for completion early in May, five miles of steel piles were driven down to solid rock to support the superstructure and the piles were strengthened by a filling of concrete resting upon a concrete base.

Steel columns and spans to be used total 11,500,000 pounds. If laid end to end they would extend forty miles and if joined to the other structural steel would have a total length of 250 miles. The cement requirements exceed 500,000 bags.

Electrical installations require 1,500,000 linear feet of wire and 700 miles of conduit. More than 120,000 pounds of putty will be used to glaze the 100,000 square feet of window glass. Six million bricks will be required in the exterior construction.

Farrar & Watmough, architects for the Mandel project, point out that it would be necessary to visualize a skyscraper 170 stories in height if the units which comprise London Terrace were placed one above the other.

Twenty passenger elevators will serve the various units. Through the centre of the apartment block will be the largest garden ever planned for a city dwelling, 80 by 600 feet.

URGES NEW STATION FOR 23D ST. AREA

Real Necessity in the Proposed Subway Extension, Says Paul H. Fairchild.

The board of directors of the Twenty-third Street Association, in favoring the extension of the Lexington-Fourth Avenue subway south of Forty-second Street with "reservoir" stations at Thirty-fourth and Forty-second Streets, suggests that the extension be continued to the south to permit the building of a station at Lexington Avenue and Twenty-third Street.

"This transit relief proposal," said Paul H. Fairchild, president of the Twenty-third Street Association, "by the extension of the Fourth Avenue line down Lexington Avenue, between Grand Central Station and Gramercy Park, is worthy and should be done. In comparison with the slight additional cost involved, greater relief can be secured by building this subway extension so as to include station facilities at Twenty-third Street.

"Changes are being made so rapidly in the Twenty-third Street district, with the building of new office structures, apartments and hotels, and the opening of the new City College, that we feel the Twenty-third Street station will exceed Thirty-third Street in the number of fares collected in a very short time. The inclusion of Twenty-third Street in this proposed subway extension is not only practicable but economically necessary."

APARTMENT OWNERS MEET.

Association of the Oranges to Hold Dinner Next Tuesday.

The Apartment House Owners' Association of the Oranges will hold its first annual dinner next Tuesday evening at the Elks Club in Newark, N. J., announces Julius A. Krieger, president. The future of apartment houses in the Oranges will be the subject for discussion.

The speakers will be Julian A. Gregory, former chairman of the Port Authority of New York; James H. Owen, chairman of the East Orange City Council, and John F. O'Brien, vice president of the New Jersey Association of Real Estate Boards. Cornelius O'Donoghue will act as toastmaster. Morris Alexander is chairman of the dinner committee.

REALTY ROMANCE IN BIXBY ESTATE

Lease of Casino Theatre Recalls Purchase of Mid-Town Farm for $200.

UNION LEAGUE ON THE SITE

Later, in 1839, John M. Bixby Paid $13,800 for the Casino Broadway Corner.

The approaching demolition of the Casino Theatre for a tall office building to be erected by the Bricken Construction Company has directed attention to the early realty investments of John M. Bixby, whose estate owns that property. Charles F. Noyes in discussing the lease of the Casino plot by Abraham Bricken states that the records show that Mr. Bixby acquired the property on Oct. 4, 1839, for $13,800 from Edgar S. and Hannah S. Van Winkle.

Mr. Bixby also bought a farm in that part of the city, of which the estate still owns the valuable northeast corner of Fifth Avenue and Thirty-ninth Street, long occupied by the Union League Club.

Moody B. Gates of the Noyes organization, who handled the Bricken transaction, quotes a statement by John M. Bixby in 1864 explaining how he accumulated his fortune:

"I think I would be a comparatively poor man today but for one incident in my life which happened many years ago. I had come to New York City from up-State, and a dollar looked pretty big to me. I was a struggling young lawyer, and, like many such, I found it no easy matter to make both ends meet. One day a friendly lawyer in the office where I had desk room said to me: 'Here's a chance for you to buy a farm, Bixby. I want to sell it to close up the estate. You can have it at the appraised value, $200. I think you will be able to get more for it in time.'

"'No, thank you,' I replied, 'I haven't the money.'

"'But,' said he, 'I will take your note for it and renew it till you sell it.'

"The upshot was that I took his advice and gave him my note for $200 for the farm. When the note came due I offered to give the farm back to him for the note. But after two or three renewals of the note New York had grown so fast northward that I was able to sell a small part of the farm for more than enough to pay the note and interest and taxes.

"The rest of the farm was then free and clear, and if I had kept it all I should now (1864) be worth about $7,000,000. As it is, I have sold parcels of it that have brought me more than $1,500,000 in cash, and I value what I have left at two or three times as much—all made out of nothing but the giving of a $200 note, which I did almost against my will."

John M. Bixby died in 1876, leaving a large fortune to his two children, Robert F. Bixby and the Countess Grace S. Mankowiski, both now dead, the latter being the mother of Robert C. Mankowski, who is now the sole heir and lessor of the Casino Theatre property, just leased to the Bricken Construction Corporation.

"There is no romance any greater than New York City real estate," adds Mr. Noyes, "and no gold mine ever produced 'pay gold' such as Broadway, Fifth Avenue, Wall Street and many other centres on good old Manhattan Island have produced for the owners."

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AWARDS FOR QUEENS BUILDINGS

PUSH PLAN TO RAZE SIXTH AVENUE 'L'

Citizens' Committee Is Being Formed to Promote Demolition Project.

NEW BUILDINGS FORECAST

Sixth Avenue Association Officials Predict Transformation of District Within Decade.

The Sixth Avenue Association is organizing two committees with a total membership of 500 to further the plan for demolishing the Sixth Avenue elevated structure, with a view to bringing together at an early date all parties interested in the matter.

One group will consist of bankers, manufacturers and business interests, headed by Charles M. Dutcher, president of the Greenwich Savings Bank, and the other will be composed of property owners and real estate men under the chairmanship of Robert E. Simon. The personnel of the committees will be announced shortly.

"The studies which our association has made in conjunction with various governmental agencies indicate that the elevated structure could be removed without causing any direct discomfort to any of our citizens," said V. Clement Jenkins, vice president and general manager of the Sixth Avenue organization.

"The removal of the Sixth Avenue elevated structure will give to the city of New York a new traffic route which will undoubtedly relieve the traffic burden of the adjoining thoroughfares, particularly Fifth and Madison Avenues, which are now called upon to carry an abnormal amount of traffic. It is not difficult to visualize how beneficial this new traffic artery would be to the retail shopping centre. It would give to persons living north of Sixtieth Street a new route through which they could reach the shops, hotels and theatres, and would provide those whose offices or businesses are located in the lower section of the city with a new quick route to midtown Manhattan or to their homes in the northern section. The traffic relief which would follow can be with a minimum of expense.

"One only has to turn back the calendar a few years and visualize what Sixth Avenue between Fifty-third and Fifty-ninth Streets used to be to appreciate what a tremendous change will take place throughout its entire length when the elevated structure is removed.

Important Transactions.

"That the keen investors have already begun to anticipate this change is evident from a consideration of several of the important realty transactions which have been disclosed since the first of the year. Prominent among these was the announcement of the purchase of the Hippodrome occupying the block front on the east side of Sixth Avenue between Forty-third and Forty-fourth Street by the Fred F. French Operators, Inc., as the site of an eighty-three-story skyscraper.

"Another interesting announcement has to do with the building now under course of construction at the northeast corner of Thirty-fifth Street and Sixth Avenue, where a new sixteen-story bank and office building will rise to house the Herald Square Branch of the Central Hanover Bank and Trust Company.

"There is no doubt but that these are but forerunners of other similar announcements. There is little doubt but that the removal of the elevated will bring about a material change also in the streets east and west of Sixth Avenue, particularly in the area between Thirty-fourth and Forty-second Streets. In the latter area, principally between Fifth and Sixth Avenues there are a great number of buildings which were originally occupied by garment manufacturers, which when the garment centre was established west of Seventh Avenue, became occupied by the millinery trade. There is an ever-increasing demand in this area for office and show-room space and as the buildings were not constructed or designed for this use, it is my opinion that within the course of the next five or ten years these buildings will be removed to make way for modern structures in which there will be no manufacturing occupancies but they will be devoted entirely to office and show-room purposes.

"The Sixth Avenue Association has been devoting its every effort to the removal of the elevated and in anticipation of this improvement has prepared a program of future activities which is now in course of study by special committees of the association. One of the activities which is receiving most serious consideration has to do with the proposed extension of the retail zone north of Fiftieth Street on Sixth Avenue. The recent studies which have been made indicate that the property owners in that area desire the protection which will come to them from this new use district.

"Another activity upon which we are working is that of bringing to Sixth Avenue the same protection under the sign law as is now enjoyed by Fifth Avenue, Madison Avenue, Thirty-fourth and Fifty-seventh Streets. Our association believes that within the course of the next ten years Sixth Avenue will undergo the greatest transformation that has ever taken place on any thoroughfare."

SLATE SALES DECLINE.

Value of Product Sold at Quarries in 1929 Was $10,868,000.

A decline of 5 per cent in the value of slate sold at quarries in the United States during 1929 as compared with 1928 is reported by the Department of Commerce. The figures were announced last week at the conference of the National Slate Association. The figure for last year was $10,868,000.

The roofing slate sold in 1929, estimated at 441,000 squares valued at $4,630,000, decreased 9 per cent in quantity and 14 per cent in value over 1928. This represents a decrease of 70 cents in the average value per square. This decrease was largely in the New York-Vermont district, where the estimated sales amounted to 148,500 squares, valued at $2,044,000, a decrease of 19 per cent in quantity.

The sales of roofing slate in Pennsylvania were estimated at 243,000 squares, valued at $1,950,000, a decrease of 5 per cent in quantity. There was an increase in sales of Virginia and Maine roofing slates. The total sales of mill stock in 1929, estimated at 9,200,000 square feet, are valued at $3,521,000, a slight decrease in quantity and an increase of 3 per cent in value.

NEWARK EXTENDING AREA OF ACTIVITY

Rapid Growth in Six Years as the Business Centre of North Jersey.

TALL BUILDING PROJECTS

Manhattan Capital Big Factor in Recent Progress, Says R. Thomas Bowers.

Building permits issued in Newark, N. J., during 1929 aggregated in value $30,418,990, bringing construction activity in that city for the last six-year period to the grand total of $247,339,475.

R. Thomas Bowers, head of the Philip J. Bowers Company of Newark, operators of a new Short Hills development and other projects, points out that the origin of a large proportion of this huge investment in North Jersey properties may be traced either directly or indirectly to Manhattan and that indications point to a constantly increasing flow of New York money into the Jersey field.

Jersey City, reporting $15,396,816 in building permits during 1929, during the six-year period with an aggregate of $99,810,320, making the total construction activities, both residential and commercial, for these two cities, to $347,149,795 for the last six years.

"The interest of Manhattan operators and investors in New Jersey's future has been mounting yearly," Mr. Bowers said. "Many of the major developments now under way or scheduled for early construction have their origin in the foresight of Metropolitan New York operators who, in a few years' time, have witnessed the rise of the Newark area to its present recognition as the third city.

Newark's Tax Values.

"To the real estate observer, the builder and the investor, the tax ratables for Newark form an accurate barometer of its possibilties. These figures twenty years ago stood at $300,000,000, and now stand at approximately one billion dollars. A recent survey showed that of the total of 45,916 residential dwellings within the city limits, 32,558 were of one and two-family construction. This large proportion of independent home owners and home renters is indicative of the activity of real estate and operating companies who early recognized the commuting advantages in Northern New Jersey suburban areas.

"Expansion of the Newark metropolitan district, in comparison with the growth of other large cities in the nation, has been of a mushroom character. The downtown district has altered its physical appearance with startling suddenness and the demand for stores, office buildings, banks, theatres and hotels has grown rapidly. During the four years from 1925 to and including 1928, building permits for structures in the business section alone totaled $42,858,257.

"Such buildings as the Lefcourt-Newark building, the new thirty-four story Northern Newark and Essex Bank Building, now under construction, and the Telephone building, completed last year, represent a total valuation of $15,000,000.

North Jersey Centre.

"It is apparent that Newark is becoming the office, business and hotel centre for the greater Newark district, just as Manhattan has long been the hub of the greater New York area. Superstructures are replacing old time buildings and, as in Manhattan, new locations are being sought. This is indicated in the removal of the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company to its large building in North Newark. In addition, there are the extensive developments of the so-called "meadows" and the Port of Newark. In the outlying sections also are various developments around Short Hills, Roseville, Clinton Hill, Forest Hill and the Ironbound section.

"Only New York and Chicago exceed in population and industrial production the Newark area which includes the sections bounded by the New York State line on the north and New Brunswick on the south, forming a great community separated and subdivided only by artificial government boundaries, but with Newark as the hub.

"It has been said that Northern Jersey is ceasing to be a commuter State serving only as a dormitory for workers commuting to Manhattan, and is regaining its 'independence,' but it cannot be denied that this commuting element seeking advantageous values, pointed the way to many new commercial, industrial and residential projects for Northern Jersey, which would otherwise have gone to New York and its environs.

"Manhattan capital has been a big factor in the progress of this area, and as the opportunities increase, and as the values of this area both from a residential and commercial standpoint become more apparent, a larger flow of New York money and an increased interest on the part of New York developers and operators, may reasonably be looked for."

CITY REBUILDING NEEDS PUBLIC AID

Wider Investment Interest Essential for Future Projects, Says Fred F. French.

PREDICTS RADICAL CHANGES

Visions Manhattan as Community of Towers and Tunnels With Elevated Highways.

Visioning the New York City of the future, Fred F. French predicts that residential communities similar to the Tudor City development at the easterly end of Forty-second Street will be constructed by the score, while super Empire and super Hippodrome-French buildings must straddle the very avenues to obtain the necessary wind-bracing for their towers of thousands of feet and hundreds of stories.

"Tunnels for general traffic purposes," says Mr. French, "must bore through the rock ledges and under the towers and rivers until, perhaps, a complete new level shall underlie the present streets. Perhaps right through the great towers themselves must traffic ways be constructed, bridging street after street. Perhaps the sidewalks in congested areas will be raised a story above the present curb levels and present sidewalks be given over to automobile traffic. Perhaps other sidewalks shall surround the towers at higher levels and bridge the streets to sidewalks around other buildings.

"If Manhattan real estate is to serve its function and continue its upward trend, these gigantic projects are indispensable. Some must be carried on by the State and city governments, and others by large aggregations of real estate investors.

"No longer is it possible for the individual or small syndicate to keep pace with the tide of inflowing people and capital reaching into millions of dollars."

Greater public interest and a larger investment by the public in real estate operations will be necessary to carry out successfully many of these huge operations in the future, Mr. French points out.

"The public became interested in real estate several years ago," he adds, "by purchasing real estate bonds, guaranteed or otherwise, and during the past ten years by investing in real estate preferred and common stocks. By partaking of real estate profits through stock ownership or failing so to do, investors may greatly multiply these profits or allow them to diminish.

"Manhattan Island has after 300 years of real estate growth outgrown the control of individual owners.

"If it is not now handled more strongly its enormous profits must inevitably wane, because it cannot otherwise be made to fully serve its purpose.

"Real estate seems to have been difficult for the public mind to understand, but it is now understood partially and will be understood more thoroughly during the present year and following years. Real estate when purchased in the right location is augmented in value by the inherent tendency of men to live and work closely together.

"It is augmented by the coming and going of traffic lines carrying people and other necessities, by shops, theatres, warehouses, railroad stations, power houses, factories and by the taller buildings of office or residence required by close herding.

"All the activities of man's world augment the value of real estate."

Open Offices in Hackensack.

Bergen, Inc., real estate and insurance, announces the opening of main offices at 31 Main Street, Hackensack, N. J. The company will continue to maintain an office at Palisade, according to William Eypper, president.

THE Queensboro Chamber of Commerce at its nineteenth annual dinner at the Commodore, on Wednesday evening, awarded plaques and certificates to those who, in the opinion of its Better Building Committee, had contributed most to the improvement of the borough by the erection of new buildings during the past year.

These competitions were inaugurated by the chamber four years ago with a view to encouraging the erection of a better and more attractive type of building, of all classes, in Queens Borough, and the presentation of these awards has become a regular feature of the chamber's annual dinners.

The presentations were made by Fred C. Lemmerman, president of the chamber. Nearly forty entries were received, embracing buildings in seven classes, as follows: Residential (single family), residential group, apartment, business and residential, business, industrial and institutional.

Awards were made in only four groups, residential, apartment, business and institutional, the committee announcing that "careful investigation disclosed no buildings of unusual merit" among the entries in the other three classes.

The owner of each of the successful buildings was awarded a bronze plaque and a certificate, and certificates went to both the architect and builder. The sub-contractors on the buildings will each receive a letter of commendation for his work.

The four buildings receiving awards were as follows:

Residential building—Residence of Arthur B. Cuddihy, Forest Hills Gardens; Lawrence M. Elliott, architect; Guyon L. C. Earle, contractor.

Apartment building — Livingston Apartments, Continental Avenue, Forest Hills. Theodore Englehardt, architect. Cord Meyer Development Company, owner and builder.

Business building—Bank of Manhattan Trust Company, Central Avenue, Far Rockaway. Morrell Smith, architect. C. T. Wills, Inc., builder.

Institutional building—Mary Immaculate Hospital, Jamaica, L. I. W. J. Boegel, architect. Thomas O'Reilly & Son, Inc., builders.

The committee making the awards was composed of Ralph E. Maskiell, president Willcox Construction Company, chairman; William E. Haugaard, State architect; William J. Savacool, chairman Borough Planning Committee of the Chamber; Alfred N. Warwick, builder; George L. Fischer, architect.

Sees No Immediate Improvement In Mortgage Money Interest Rate

Flow of Funds Into Savings Banks and Loaning Institutions Is Essential for Easier Realty Conditions, Says William L. Hewson.

Mortgage money is returning slowly to its field after being diverted to other purposes, but there is little hope in the present situation that lower interest rates will come quickly, in the opinion of William Leake Hewson, president of Hewson & Cottrell.

The general statement that mortgage money will be more plentiful during 1930 has been repeated so often lately that it has become almost a conviction in the minds of real estate interests, Mr. Hewson says, when in reality the statement represents little more than a wish which is father to the thought.

"Mortgage money at 5½ per cent interest is now available only to a very limited degree," he states. "If I were a borrower whose necessities required the completion of a specific mortgage negotiation within the next three months, I would exercise extreme hesitancy about turning down an otherwise acceptable proposition, because it carried a 6 per cent interest rate. I do not feel that the prospects of a 5½ per cent, or better, interest rate prevailing in the immediate future can be considered as a reasonable certainty. In my opinion it is a possibility but a remote probability.

"A combination of circumstances, in many respects remote from speculation in Wall Street, has been responsible for the dearth of mortgage money in the immediate past. Likewise, a combination of favorable circumstances, requiring some time to become operative, is essential before interest rates will soften and money become sufficiently plentiful to encourage building operations and real estate activity on a scale approximating that of the year 1928 and early in 1929.

"Savings bank deposits must increase; loans to life insurance policy holders must be liquidated; existing vacancies must be reduced; a definite favorable trend in industrial activity must be re-established; the tone of business generally must become genuinely optimistic, and the investing public will require time to accumulate funds to give expression to their recreated desire to return to mortgage certificate and other types of real estate securities. All the foregoing must be experienced in order to approximate the mortgage situation of a year ago.

"One of the outstanding phases of the period through which we have just passed has been an absence of 'distress' borrowing. There has been a noticeable attitude on the part of the holders of maturing mortgages to cooperate in every reasonable respect in the endeavor of the borrower to adjust his situation to the changed conditions.

"Money has been scarce, and while the 6 per cent interest rate has prevailed in most instances where new loans have been made there has been no panicky insistence on excessively conservative amounts. The accepted 60 per cent borrowing capacity has prevailed almost universally.

"In my opinion, it is reasonable to expect a gradual increase in funds for which there will be sufficient demand to justify the lender requiring generally a 6 per cent interest rate for the immediate present. As the 'pressing' financing and refinancing situations are disposed of, the gradual increase in available funds should automatically require the lenders to break the interest rate to 5½ per cent, and possibly 5 per cent, in order to obtain mortgages secured by choice centrally located parcels."

SUBURBAN ACTIVITY.

J. E. McGolrick Predicts Active Building of Homes This Year.

Considerable activity in real estate during 1930, particularly in the suburban field, is predicted by J. E. McGolrick, president of the McGolrick Realty Company.

The prospect of easier mortgage money will bring to a realization the building of many private homes, work on which has been deferred in recent months due to high money rates, Mr. McGolrick states. With the prospects of employment favorable, the number of buyers of suburban real estate should be substantially increased shortly, he believes.

Developers Sponsor School.

A school of real estate has been started by Brady, Cryan & Colleran, with five sessions a week, including lectures illustrated with motion pictures. All members of the realty firm's organization are required to attend. The instructors are Professor A. G. Mulligan of Fordham University and Manhattan College; James W. Elder, realty economist, and James S. Keily, director of sales for the developers.

Birdsall Firm on Broadway.

Daniel Birdsall & Co., formerly of 56 Worth Street, has moved its real estate and insurance business to 325 Broadway. This is close to the original offices of the firm established by Daniel Birdsall in 1860 at the corner of Broadway and Reade Street. Clifford H. S. Jaffray is president.

SCARSDALE LIMITS WIDELY EXTENDED

Growth of Community Makes It Difficult to Tell the Exact Location of the Village.

ADJACENT AREAS CONFUSED

Now Popularly Includes Sections in Yonkers, Greenburg and East Chester.

Calling attention to the fact that Scarsdale, with its rapid and high-class home development within recent years, has actually outgrown its original boundaries. Martin H. Sherwin, manager of the Scarsdale department of the Robert L. Farley organization, says that today there is really difficulty in determining just where Scarsdale begins and ends.

"One would assume," he says, "that accurately to locate such a well-known village in such a famous county would be the simplest of tasks. Yet despite the fact that Scarsdale is on the well-traveled Bronx River Parkway, the White Plains Post Road, the Hutchinson River Parkway and on two railroads, very few people can say for a fact when they are in it and when they are not.

"To understand the situation it is necessary to go back a good many years to the time when the New York Central and Harlem Railroad first pushed up through central Westchester. Its course lay along the Bronx River at the westerly boundary line of the present township of Scarsdale, then a sparsely populated farming country. A station was placed at the crossing of the highway which ran from the White Plains Post Road across the hills to Ardsley.

"Then, because the few inhabitants of the surrounding locality lived in the sections included in the town of Scarsdale to the east of the station, the station became known as the Scarsdale station, even though the location was practically on the boundary line between Scarsdale and the town of Greenburg and but a stone's throw from the border line of the city of Yonkers and the town of East Chester.

"As time went on the rolling meadows of Scarsdale became dotted with fine homes, whereas the near-by portions of Greenburg, East Chester and Yonkers, because of their rugged character and comparatve inaccessibility remained undeveloped. Thus, the name Scarsdale as applied to the station and the area about it became confirmed in popular usage. More recently, as land has become scarcer in Scarsdale (now a village as well as a town), hundreds of families have occupied homes prepared for them in the near-by portions of Greenburg, Yonkers and East Chester, but still witihn easy reach of the Scarsdale station.

Scarsdale Section Extended.

"As this gradual growth has taken place, the name Scarsdale has grown in popularity until today it is commonly applied to all that section which owes its growth to the presence of the Scarsdale station. It is natural that this should be. The community, in so far as outward appearance is concerned, is a unit. Every family uses the Scarsdale stores, the Scarsdale theatre, the Scarsdale telephone exchange, the Scarsdale postoffice, as well as the Scarsdale station.

"A strong movement now is under way in one of these communities to unite with the Scarsdale school district, which incidentally does not cover all of the town of Scarsdale itself. Even though property owners pay their taxes to East Chester, Greenburg or Yonkers, and receive from them police and fire protection and school facilities, it is only logical that they should call themselves by the name of the community of which they are a part to all outward appearances.

"Such a situation is perplexing to the new arrival. He may find that a friend who said that he lives in Scarsdale is actually a resident of Yonkers, although his home is many miles from the Yonkers station, which is not even on the same railroad; so, too, with his acquaintance who has boasted that his home is but two minutes' walk from the Scarsdale station and yet really lives in the town of Greenburg, a town for which no community is named but which includes within its boundaries such well-known villages as Ardsley, Tarrytown and Hastings-on-the-Hudson. Then again he may be directed to the home of a bona fide resident of the town of Scarsdale only to find it a ten-minute taxi drive from the Scarsdale station.

"Such situations at times are likely to confuse prospective home buyers anxious to locate in a definite locality. To obviate future annoyances, a safe course would be to obtain information from one who, through experience, knows the locality and who can be trusted to explain and to interpret the conditions.

Too often dissatisfaction with the home that is purchased is traceable to the fact that the buyer has considered his broker as a mere source of listings, to be used only as a last resort, rather than as an expert whose function it is to save him time, money and disappointment."

COOPERATIVE GOING UP.

Nineteen-Story Park Av. Building to House Thirty-five Families.

The nineteen-story and penthouse cooperative apartment building being erected on the southeast corner of Park Avenue and Seventy-ninth Street is beginning to take form, and steel work has reached the fourth floor, according to Pease & Elliman, agents. The structure, to be known as 895 Park Avenue, will be ready for occupancy in the Summer. It is being built under height restrictions applying before the multiple dwelling law went into effect. Thomas O'Reilly & Son, Inc., is the builder.

Among the features incorporated in the plans by Sloan & Robertson, the architects, are a squash court, gymnasium and locker rooms in the basement. There will be suites for thirty-five families.

SALON FOR BEAUTY.

Elizabeth Arden Opens New Rooms at 691 Fifth Avenue.

A new beauty salon was opened last week by Elizabeth Arden at 691 Fifth Avenue. Mrs. John Alden Carpenter decorated the salon and Nicholas Remisoff, the scenic artist of the original Chauve Souris, decorated the shop.

A note of classic severity and yet modernistic feeling is presented by the walls of glass in jade green with cut glass feathers hiding the lights. On the five upper floors, each decorated in individual style, are treatment rooms, rooms for exercise, tap dancing, and rooms for the use of the electric mask treatments and other innovations.

HELP BUYERS IN JERSEY.

New Organization Will List All Types of Suburban Property.

A number of prominent New Jersey real estate brokers and developers have approved a new merchandising idea as expressed in Suburban New Jersey, Inc., with offices at 15 West Thirty-fourth Street.

It is an organization composed of experienced real estate men, organized to meet the need of an effective means of reaching the buying power of the active New York market. From the point of view of the public it is a permanent exhibition and a free information bureau about New Jersey, its communities and specific properties.

The New Jersey owner who desires to sell actually "shows" his property to many people who otherwise would not know of its existence. The broker is assisted and fully protected, the purchaser is facilitated and guided. Every party to the transaction will benefit, as Suburban New Jersey, Inc., does not participate in any way in commissions.

No selling is permitted on the premises and the identity of visitors is not divulged unless, at their own request, they wish to visit a community or inspect a specific property, when they are referred to one of the affiliated brokers handling such property.

LOWER WEST SIDE REALTY CONDITIONS

Eighth Avenue Terminal Project Said to Have Retarded Trading.

LARGE APARTMENT PLANS

Lack of Mortgage Money Is Holding Up Some Developments, Reports W. A. Littell.

Normal trading activity in the immediate vicinity of the proposed freight terminal on the block bounded by Eighth and Ninth Avenues, Fifteenth and Sixteenth Streets, has been suspended to a large extent, reports the Market and Business Men's Association of the Greenwich and Chelsea districts, in reviewing some of the important features of the past year in those westerly Manhattan areas. The final effect on property values is still to be determined.

Announcement of the plan brought forth protests by property owners, business men and residents of the district, their unanimous opinion being that the project would have an undesirable effect on the development of the section for high-class residential purposes. The Market and Business Men's Association is continuing its campaign for the removal of the trucking terminal further to the west.

In the block itself the Port Authority has acquired what is estimated as between 50 and 60 per cent of the necessary land and has the ability to acquire the rest by condemnation. In adjoining blocks there has been no sale or transfer worthy of mention since the announcement.

Seventh Avenue Homes.

"Recent months have seen the beginning of the district's most important residential development," states William A. Littell, executive secretary of the association. "Steelwork is nearing completion on the sixteen-story apartment house being constructed at Sixteenth Street and Seventh Avenue, southwest corner, by the Henry Mandel Companies. The Mandel interests control some 60 per cent of all property on Seventh Avenue between Fourteenth and Twenty-third Streets, and have mapped out a comprehensive residential improvement program for that section.

"An indication of popular favor is to be found in the fact that three of the five ground floor shops have been rented and many inquiries are being received for apartments. It is understood that borings are being made for a second building at the northeast corner of Sixteenth Street and Seventh Avenue.

"The twenty-story building of the County Trust Company at Eighth Avenue and Fourteenth Street is nearing completion, and will stand as a striking monument to the late James J. Riordan, former president of the bank. As the first venture of its kind, and standing at the heart of the business and residential centre in this locality, rentals in the new building, in charge of the Charles F. Noyes Company, will be watched with interest.

"Along Eleventh Avenue and Washington Street, the New York Central Railroad has been active in acquiring properties for its new right-of-way as a part of the west side improvement plan which was opened with an official celebration a few weeks ago. With the exception of the wrecking of two buildings, one in Twenty-first Street and the other in Thirtieth Street, no work has yet been done in this section, nor is to be expected for some time. In most cases the railroad is giving short leases to occupants of buildings which it takes over.

"The Henry Mandel Companies are renting suites in the first apartment structures under construction on the block between Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Streets, Ninth and Tenth Avenues. Another large development is the Bing & Bing project for Abingdon Square. Several buildings have been razed there for three sixteen-story apartments.

"There are in addition a few smaller apartments and renovation projects going on. Mention should be made of the new twenty-three-story telephone building between Seventeenth and Eighteenth Streets, which is expected to house several of the near-by exchanges.

"Generally speaking, conditions in the property market in this section are quite satisfactory. There is a high percentage of both business and residential occupancy, and with the anticipated completion of the Eighth Avenue subway and the Fourteenth Street extension, healthy and progressive conditions are anticipated.

"The most important contributing cause in the recent slowing up of developments is the temporary tightness in the mortgage market. Money is not readily available for large construction projects, and as a result there has been a slight recession in the development schedule."

HOUSING TOO COSTLY, BUILDER DECLARES

Suites of Simpler Design Are Needed for Men of Modest Income, Says Davis.

HE SEES TOO MUCH LUXURY

Fineness in Building Seen Carried Almost to the Breaking Point.

G. Richard Davis, president of G. Richard Davis & Co., Inc., building contractors, speaking at the monthly dinner meeting of the Building Managers and Owners Association of New York, Inc., last week said it seemed impossible to produce an apartment that an ordinary man, with the ordinary income, could afford to live in. Mr. Davis declared that he thought the building industry had gone a little too far in the swing of the pendulum in its fineness in building.

"We have gotten almost to the breaking point in our fineness in building," the speaker said. "One of the things we can do to overcome this condition is to decrease some of our requirements, to take a different perspective and look backward but more simply.

"I make a plea for you men who influence the occupants and prospective occupants of your building to cut out the unnecessary things in the interiors for those who want suitable space in a reasonably accessible location but can't afford to pay the high rate which now exists all over the general part of the city.

"I do not think that architectural design plays as great a part in renting as people give it credit for, nevertheless it is important that our architectural designing, which has greatly improved in the past five years, should continue to be done by men who can do it. There is no influence that you can exert to help New York, to stabilize its values and make property rentable more than to employ architects who have good taste, sound abilities and careful training.

More Remodeling Needed.

"One of the problems which you gentlemen have to face is one which has been given very small thought by the best men, and that is remodeling. It is an important problem to make old buildings useable and rentable. It seems to me your fault that you do not put more stress on the very things right under your nose, such as renovating, heating and lighting fixtures, wooden doors and elevators, which would cost little to change and make your old building look like new.

"I have, since my first experience in the business, become very sympathetic with the point of view of the building manager.

"Real estate business in New York City is different from other places in the world. I have been to many cities, but there is nothing to compare with New York in its specialized treatment of real estate. That is due to the care given to building management.

"We have greatly increased the problem of building management by suddenly awakening to the necessity of building units. Just think what the Empire State Building means to this city and the large buildings in Chicago that are being built to such gigantic proportions that building management means the running of a small city. The heads of some small towns have nothing like the population we have in the great office buildings that we see in this city.

"In apartment houses, the units have grown. We all have seen the evidences of only a generation ago when the units were small and a ten or twenty family house of five or six stories high was finally succeeded by the present condition—200 or 300 families in one building, with elevators running to what was then unheard of heights. What does this mean? It means a higher type of service and specialization, the attracting to the field of building management men of brains and ability.

"One of the things which our large real estate firms should consider is the importance of building management. It is the backbone of real estate and no time will emphasize it as the present time. The officers of great firms have not offered salaries and opportunities commensurate with responsibilities of the job of building management. They have allowed the sales division to monopolize the principal part of the business, but what would real estate be without management? It is true that if you men who specialize in it become real specialists in it, you have an opportunity in the next twenty years that will far outweight the disadvantages and give you an income in turn commensurate with the responsibilities you are assuming.

"My profession is very closely allied with yours and in the past few years it has been emphasized to me strongly by the tremendous amount of questions raised by the men of your association as to why buildings have been built as they have been, and why the mistakes of former generations have been perpetuated, and why the troubles that the building managers have should exist.

Manager in Building Design.

"The building manager should sit in in the preliminary stages of a building, when the plans are being drawn and the specifications are being written. He should then voice his objection to inferior quality, inferior design and uneconomical equipment, and not after the harm is done.

"I do not know of a question that is asked more of the building manager than: What will it cost to operate this building? You know that the statement, it costs 50 cents a square foot to operate or 49 or 85 cents, is purely a rule of comparison and it means nothing if you are to take each building by itself in comparison to another. It is merely a guide.

"The most frequent problem that I have to solve is to get a given plot and get an architect to draw a sketch which will indicate the number of square feet of rentable area or the number of rooms with their arrangement, and then to approximate the cost of that building. We do this by three methods: We cube it and we fix a cubic cost; we compare it with buildings of similar type that we built elsewhere and get a comparative cost, and we unit it and compare it with units of other buildings where through experience we have acquired that unit value, and we get a unit cost. To be more specific, cubic cost is the easiest.

"From the building manager's point of view the increased perimeter of a rectangular or irregular shaped building gives more exterior renting space, more windows, more office space if it is an office building, more rooms if it is an apartment house, but does not put that building in the same cubic cost as the square building because it is not correct.

"A building 100 by 100 feet and another 50 by 200 feet have the same plot area of 10,000 square feet, but the first has a perimeter of 400 feet and the second a perimeter of 500 feet. The latter means that it will cost 25 per cent more for windows, walls, corridors and pipe lines.

"I think that every one of you is interested in the probable cost of apartment houses to be built under the new multiple dwellings act. None of them has been built as yet, many are in the course of construction or the preparation of plans is being made for them. I have seen a number of plans of these buildings, but I have yet to see anything that I may be enthusiastic over as far as the possibility of building such buildings economically is concerned. Another very tricky part of the law that the writers did not stress is the fact that the higher you go the greater you have to increase your yards in courts at their base.

"It is very questionable as to how this multiple dwellings act is going to work out. I think it is a good thing because it is giving us a chance at a time when it is needed to ascertain whether more apartments are going to be built. Another serious question confronting us is how many plots in New York could be acquired of the shape suitable for apartment houses to meet the requirements of the new act.

"The office and the loft building costs have increased greatly in the past ten years, and a great many men have not thoroughly studied why they have increased. One of the strong reasons for increase is not in the increase in material of labor, but in demand in requirements. We all want to rent up-to-date apartments and offices. We have equipment in buildings that we did not know of fifteen years ago and also elevator requirements that did not exist."

ACTIVE FEATURES OF CITY AND SUBURBAN REAL ESTATE

MANY BIG BUILDINGS IN WRECKERS' HANDS

Shifting Neighborhoods, Changing Tastes and Land Values Force Demolition.

OLD THEATRES PASSING

Irwin S. Chanin Estimates That One-half of Buildings on Manhattan Are at Obsolescent Stage.

Despite the large amount of construction work completed in Manhattan within the past few years fully one-half of the buildings on the island either are obsolete or are approaching obsolescence, points out Irwin S. Chanin, head of the Chanin Construction Company.

Acceleration of the building pace over a period of several years would fail to make any impressive reduction in the percentage of antiquated buildings, Mr. Chanin believes. Shifting neighborhoods, changing tastes and economic pressure due to rising land values are the chief reasons why buildings are being scrapped at an average age of thirty-five years. These considerations, rather than actual decrepitude or wear, are forcing the demolition of many steel-frame buildings considered structural marvels when they were put up only about a third of a century ago.

"I am leaving out of consideration," Mr. Chanin said, "so-called old-law tenements and even brownstone houses and flats of four or five stories which still occupy such a large percentage of our potentially desirable residential neighborhoods from Lexington Avenue to the East River and from Ninth Avenue to the Hudson River. I think there is little disagreement with my view that for sociological reasons alone the sooner these structures pass from the map the better it will be for the health and well-being of the city.

"Six well-known New York buildings are now being razed or are scheduled to disappear during 1930 to make way for building operations of unusual importance. I have singled out these structures because they illustrate graphically three of the real reasons why buildings become obsolete in Manhattan. Of course, all three factors have entered into the fate of each building. In each case, however, one factor seems to stand out above the others. The history of these buildings also tends to establish that thirty-five years may be considered the life cycle of a Manhattan building.

"The Casino Theatre, at Thirty-ninth Street and Broadway, and the Knickerbocker Theatre, at Thirty-eighth Street and Broadway, are examples of the fate resulting from a shifting neighborhood. The Casino was opened about 1883 and is now 47 years old. The theatrical district then was located between Twenty-third Street and Herald Square, and the theatre by most showmen was considered 'too far uptown.' The Knickerbocker Theatre was opened about 1893. In four decades the theatrical district caught up with the Casino and the Knickerbocker, passed them and now has its centre approximately at Forty-fifth Street and Broadway. The Knickerbocker and the Casino sites are now on a business district largely devoted to the garment industries.

"The Hippodrome and the Century are examples of buildings which have become obsolete for no reason more tangible than a change in public taste. The Hippodrome was opened in 1905 and the Century in 1909. They are intended for large presentations in which several hundred persons appeared on the stage. They were practically the only places where such presentations were possible. Spectacular productions now are managed much better on the motion-picture screen with a greater semblance of realism, and the people who used to support this type of entertainment flock to the movies.

"The Waldorf-Astoria and the Hotel Majestic are examples of buildings which were unable to withstand economic competition because of an increase in land values. Both were opened in the early '90s and were the finest hotels of their time. The Waldorf had the incomparable advantage of a block frontage on Fifth Avenue, the Majestic of a block frontage on Central Park West. To the end, both continued to be 'first-class' hotels, commanding liberal rates and a fine clientele.

"This situation seems to present ample indication of the stability and permanence of the building industry in New York City. While the volume of building may slow down occasionally because of temporary influences, I believe that such factors as the constantly rising standard of living which gives to thousands each year the ability to occupy homes of a better quality, as well as changing tastes and modes of life, make it inconceivable that New York can ever be built up completely and finally."

TWO BRONX THEATRES OFFERED AT AUCTION

Leaseholds on Three Others Will Be Included in Murphy's Sales.

Two Bronx motion picture houses are included in the auction offerings of the James R. Murphy organization for the coming week. The sales include also leaseholds on one other Bronx theatre and leaseholds on two theatres in Yonkers.

The five holdings will be offered next Friday in the Bronx salesroom. The theatres to be sold are the Interboro, 3,452 East Tremont Avenue, a two-story brick building, and the brick building at 1,320 Castle Hill Avenue. The Bronx leasehold is on the Rosedale Theatre, 1,800 Westchester Avenue.

Other sales to be are:

Monday, Jan. 27, in the Bronx salesroom, 231-233 East 235th Street, two one-family brick houses with private garages.

Tuesday—1,513-1,515 Mace Avenue, two two-story brick houses; four vacant lots at the northeast corner of Beach and 177th Street and a vacant plot on the east side of Reservoir Oval 100 feet south of Reservoir Place.

Wednesday — 510-512 Casanova Street, one-story brick building; vacant lot, 50 by 100 feet, on the north side of Westchester Avenue, 287 feet east of Storrow Street, and 2,830 Sedgwick Avenue and 165 West 197th Street, northeast corner of Sedgwick Avenue and 197th Street, two six-story brick apartment houses known as the Ann Rose Towers, plot 166 by 200 feet by irregular. On the same day in the Brooklyn salesroom at 189 Montague Street, 110 Avenue T, two-story building.

SEES BUSINESS TREND TO COLUMBUS CIRCLE

H. R. Hoffman Predicts Development There Will Be Similar to That of Times Square.

Increasing business and real estate interest in and around Columbus Circle during the present year is predicted by Hugo R. Hoffman, owner of the General Motors Building, at Fifty-seventh Street and Broadway. Mr. Hoffman believes the opening of the new Eighth Avenue subway will hasten the improvement originally planned by real estate operators with holdings in that section.

It has been estimated by the city that 402,000,000 persons will use the new subway during the first year of its operation and that number will be more than doubled within the succeeding period of seven years.

Mr. Hoffman, who purchased the General Motors Building, representing an investment of $15,000,000, less than a year ago, has closed a successful year in attracting new tenants to the building, which is now practically 98 per cent filled. He attributes this record to the general recognition on the part of business firms that the Columbus Circle section is becoming an advantageous business location.

"Restoration of Eighth Avenue and Central Park West to comfortable traffic uses, following the completion of the subway work," said Mr. Hoffman, "has been a great factor in directing attention to the Columbus Circle area. There have been many inquiries by business men regarding space in the General Motors Building because they wish their offices to be in closer proximinity to their homes, thereby avoiding the inconvenient transit congestion.

"Columbus Circle and the office buildings in its immediate vicinity will continue to be regarded in this way and get the benefit of the major residential development now taking place on all sides of Central Park. I believe that the new Eighth Avenue subway will stimulate building activity in the Columbus Circle zone, so that the general development of that section of the city will very likely parallel the remarkable growth of Times Square in the last ten years or more.

"I agree with those who predict the extension of the theatrical district further north to take in the side streets south of Fifty-seventh Street. I also see the coming of additional hotels and apartment houses on the west side of Eighth Avenue in the same vicinity.

"The Columbus Circle zone will be one of the most accessible centres in the city. We must keep in mind that the new station at Columbus Circle will also be a terminus of the new Fifty-third Street subway, which will bring in people from Jamaica, Kew Gardens, Forest Hills and other points on Long Island. It has already been recommended to the Board of Transportation that all the subways at Columbus Circle be connected by means of a mezzanine level running under Fifty-seventh Street from Eighth Avenue to Seventh Avenue. This would connect the new subway, the Interborough and the B. M. T., and would certainly be a forward step.

"I am in hearty accord with the movement of the Eighth Avenue Association, which, in cooperation with other civic bodies, has initiated a campaign to bring about the elimination of the Eighth Avenue street car line and the substitution of a modern bus system."

FORECASTS ACTIVITY IN BRONX REALTY

S. E. McRickard Sees Increased Sales of Private Homes in 1930.

Renewed activity in real estate in the Bronx later on in 1930 is predicted by S. E. McRickard, president of the Real Estate Board of the Bronx, Inc.

"Readjustment during the past year has been a healthy move, and today a ratio of supply and demand near normal is noted," Mr. McRickard asserts. "Furthermore, no slump in the value of real estate in the metropolitan area has resulted during this period, thus showing the soundness of New York property values generally.

"In recent months renting has shown a decided change for the better, and the reaction from the unusual bull market has added to the strong present trend toward real estate as a safe and sound investment.

"The outlook for real estate during the coming year is very promising to the broker, operator and investor. Mortgage money is easier today than it has been at any time during 1929, and ample funds are now available for investment in this class of security. Throughout the Bronx brokers report that inquiries for the purchase of real estate are increasing daily, and all of the present indications are that we shall quickly return to a healthy normal market where proper financing and sound values shall prevail. This is the very best condition that can exist in the real estate market for the broker and the investor alike.

"Brokers are confident that the Spring will bring a good renting season and an active market in private dwellings and business properties, followed by a demand for multi-family dwellings and vacant land for building operations."

Leases Brooklyn Space.

The Morris Plan Company of New York has leased the ground floor of the Central Building at 191 Joralemon Street, Brooklyn, for twenty-one years and in the early Spring will move its offices from 198 Montague Street. The lease was negotiated by Henry Gilligan & Co. as brokers. The new offices will provide twice as much space as the present quarters.

Great Neck Realty Chapter.

The Great Neck Chapter of the Long Island Real Estate Board will receive its charter, presented by William L. Enequist, president of the board, at a dinner meeting of the Nassau-Suffolk division, next Wednesday. The principal speaker at the meeting will be Charles U. Powell, engineer of the Topographical Bureau in Queens County.

Massapequa Homes Sold.

Sales totaling $91,300 were consummated last week-end by Brady, Cryan & Colleran in the company's development at Massapequa Park, L. I., including four homes in the English Colonial section near Sunrise Highway. The special train to the development last Sunday carried 480 persons.

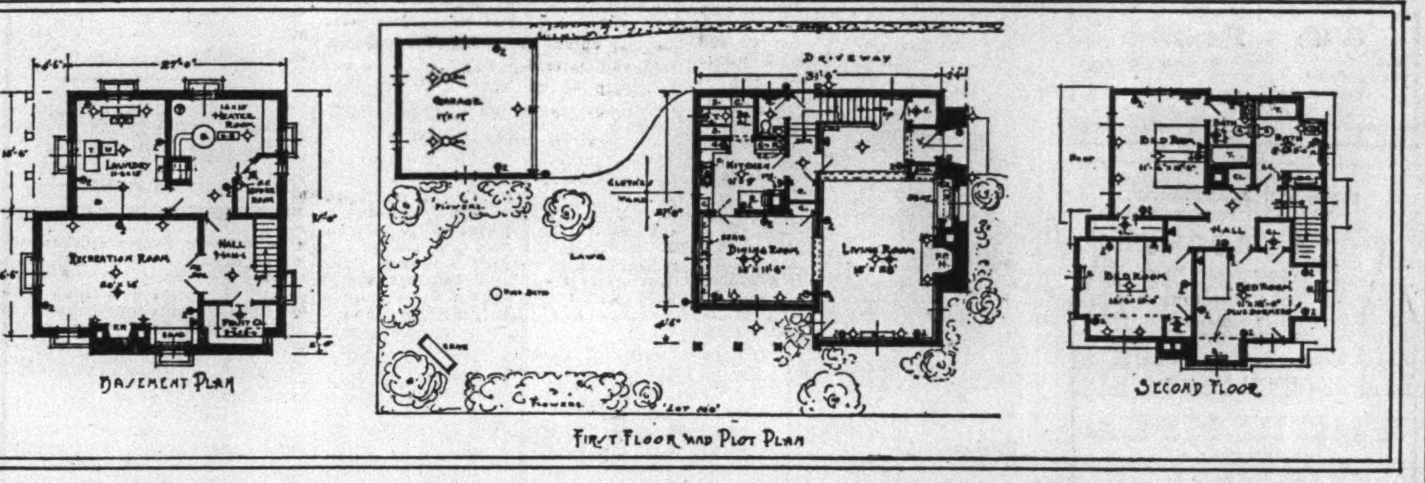
IMPRESSIVE HOUSE FRONT UTILIZES STONE FOUND ON HOME SITE

THE home builder who selects a stony lot on which to erect the house featured today will find construction costs somewhat reduced, for he can utilize rock found on his homesite for an impressive architectural effect. Stone wall originally placed to mark the boundary line of an old farm may afford satisfactory material for a portion of this informal and pleasing dwelling.

Selection and laying-up of the stone will have a great deal to do with the satisfaction or dissatisfaction which the owner may feel in his completed house. Stone should be so cut that horizontal courses will carry through most of the masonry, as suggested by the sketch which accompanies this article. Such an emphasis of horizontal lines produces an effect of stability and sturdiness so that the observer feels, as he looks at the house, that a heavy building material has come to a permanent rest. Round cobblestones which are sometimes seen masquerading as masonry construction should be avoided.

Color will depend upon the type of stone which is found near the homesite. Some of the rock most satisfactorily used contains mica and quartz which add their sparkle under the sun's rays to the pink, gray and blue casts which run through the stone itself. Such a wide range of color is often found within a restricted area.

The Apparent Height of This Attractive Home Is Reduced by the Long, Sloping Gables Which Offer an Opportunity for the Exhibition of a Roofing Material in Keeping With the General Rugged Informality of the Design. H. H. Eads, Registered Architect of Minneapolis, Minn., Designed This House, Which Received an Award in the Mid-Western States Contest of the 1929 National Better Homes Architectural Competition, Conducted by Home Owners Institute.



An Ideal Little Library Ingle Nook Is Formed Between Fireplace, Deep Recessed Window Seat and Book Shelves in One Section of the Living Room of This House. Something of the Architectural Effect of the Exterior Is Brought Within This Room by the Stone-Facing of the Fireplace. Cabinets in the Dining Room Are Built Into the Wall, Serving an Architectural as Well as a Utilitarian Purpose. Three Picturesque Bedrooms With Sloping Ceilings Lending Quaint Backgrounds to Furnishings Are Found on the Second Floor. Two Baths Are Also Located on This Floor, One of Which Is Ample in Size to Allow for the Installation of a Permanent Dressing Table.

Treatment of the mortar joints will play an important part also in the final effect. The addition of colors to mortar should be carefully considered, so that they will neither clash with nor spoil the natural beauty of the stone.

Designed by H. H. Eads, registered architect, of Minneapolis, Minn., this house has six rooms, two baths, first-floor lavatory and breakfast alcove. It received a $500 award in the Mid-Western States contest of the 1929 National Better Homes Architectural Competition conducted by the Home Owners' Institute. The region comprised the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Kansas, Nebraka, Missouri, Iowa and Minnesota.

Concerning his selection of this type of architecture as his entry in the competition, Mr. Eads says: "I chose the English cottage style exterior because it is adaptable to the small house and avoids the stilted appearance of a full two-story house and lends itself to a variety of materials subject to the choice of the home builder and local conditions. However, the selection of materials, color combinations and method of application should be given very careful consideration in any locality, as a good design is easily ruined by an improper choice of materials."

The architect has succeeded in developing a design which impresses the passer-by with its sturdy construction. Yet examination reveals that the stone which is chiefly instrumental in producing this effect has been used on only a small portion of the entire house. Stucco or metal lath with half-timber portions introduced in an interesting manner on a large section of the upper floors lends variety to the textures of the exterior. The porch tucked in back of the side of the gable serves as a sheltered oudoor living room for the family and combines with long, sloping roof lines to bring the whole structure close to the ground.

Decorative Half-Timber.

An imaginative treatment of the English cottage style dominates the whole exterior. A little gable projects beyond the face of the stone wall, wood brackets which presumably support its overhang being anchored back into the stonework. This gable provides an interesting alcove in one of the upper bedrooms and affords the designer an opportunity for a touch in half-timber which is decidedly out of the ordinary.

In the early English precedent from which this house takes its line and detail half-timber work consisted of massive structural timbers with the spaces between them filled with brick or plaster to keep out the weather. As is the case with all frame structures, diagonal framing was used to strengthen the corners of the structure and prevent distortion.

Modern designers, while appreciating the beauty of the exterior of these heavily framed buildings, must also concern themselves with the necessity for efficiently keeping out rain and wind. Therefore they completely enclose the structural members of the house and apply these half-timbers simply as part of the decorative scheme. Usually, although apparently heavy, they are of slight thickness.

An open balcony at the side of the gable over the entrance door is an additional decorative touch in the spirit of old English designs. Its wooden balustrade is made up of boards cut out with a jig-saw in such a manner as to develop a pattern. The balusters are flat and measure about five or six inches wide and seven-eighths of an inch thick. Their jig-saw pattern shows up in decorative profile against the stucco wall of the gable behind them. Yet the whole of this detail is kept very simple.

Long, sloping gables bring down the apparent height of the building and offer an opportunity for the exhibition of a roofing material in keeping with the architectural color scheme and the general rugged informality of the design. In some localities where slate is widely used, the home builder will find blue-gray slate with possibly a touch of color the preferred choice. Where slate is not easily obtained, asbestos shingles will meet the requirements of fire safety and color variety. Stained cedar shingles in blended shades of browns and tans would likewise make an effective topping for this house. Choice of roofing would, of course, be subject to local building codes as well as to the home builder's taste.

Many Gables Add Charm.

Many gables with many breaks in walls and roof result in a charming architectural effect, one which any home builder will find attractive in preference to the square box-like house which may be somewhat cheaper to build but which never satisfies so adequately in appearance as does a house of the type pictured today.

Masonry construction is indicated by heavy walls on the first floor plan. A stone wall must be at least eighteen inches thick. The deep reveal at the entrance door, which serves partly as a protection for the person standing at the door and which also casts a picturesque shadow, emphasizes the importance of this particular feature made possible only by this thick stone wall.

In the entrance to the doorway we find two electric outlets, one for the doorbell and the other for decorative outdoor lighting effects. This latter is a special outlet protected against the weather and is convenient when Winter holidays or Summer lawn fêtes call for the beauty of outdoor lighting. The doorbell, connected by means of a proper type of transformer with the electric current, does not rely on dry batteries for its power and hence is not a source of dissatisfaction when the unexpected visitor turns away in disappointment because the bell has not done its duty in announcing his presence.

Vestibule Wind Barrier.

Measuring 15 by 28 feet the living room occupies the entire front of the building. The designer has provided a vestibule just inside the entrance door so that the visitor becomes somewhat acquainted with indoors before entering the living room. This vestibule space has no door on the inside but in Winter time a door could very easily be hung. In cold weather it would be logical to presume that such a door could remain closed to keep out the cold air which would sweep in when entrance door was opened. In warmer seasons this temporary barrier against the cold could be removed. Coats and hats are hung in the large coat closet at the foot of the stairs.

The impressive length of the living room is increased by including the stair hall in its actual floor space, for a wide arch is the only separation between living room and stair hall. The irregular and very effective handling of the exterior of the house is reproduced throughout the design of this living room. Fireplace, deep recessed window seat, and book shelves just around the corner combine to form an ideal little library inglenook.

An outlet for a telephone makes it possible to have this instrument nicely placed near this permanent window seat. The stone facing of the fireplace brings something of the exterior within the house itself. Particular care should be taken to procure colorful stones for this purpose. With the help of the window in the stair hall which, as we have said, is not separated from the living room, any one within the living room may look out of the house from any one of four different sides.

The dining room will probably be separated by draperies from the living room, as an open archway connects these two rooms. Directly opposite the entrance from the living room is a broad window flanked on either side by built-in cabinets. This effective interior arrangement draws one's attention immediately upon entering the room. Cabinets serving architectural as well as utilitarian purposes should be built of the same wood as door and window trim, and should be finished by the decorator in the same manner as the trim. The window on the wall catacorner with the one described looks out into the side porch and may be changed to a door at the option of the home builder.

The compact kitchen measures 11 by 9 feet. Its equipment includes a sink under the window, numerous built-in cabinets for pots, pans and china, an electric refrigerator and a gas range. In addition to these essentials are openings to clothes chute and to the household incinerator in the basement.

Cross-Ventilation Through Alcove.

Two windows make the secluded little breakfast alcove a pleasant, airy room in warm weather when constant ventilation is desirable. Because this alcove opens into the kitchen its windows assist in giving cross-ventilation to the kitchen itself.

Three steps down at the service entrance is a platform. At this level, lower than the rest of the first floor, is located the lavatory. Service door opens out upon the driveway to the garage. Steps lead immediately down cellar so that the furnace man coming in from outside need not tramp through the rest of the house to pursue his duties.

A large fireplace is the dominating feature of the basement recreation room. Like that in the living room, it, too, has a cozy window seat beside it. The room measures 20 by 14 feet, an ample size for even a large gathering of persons who might be entertained informally in its effective atmosphere. The whole chimney breast above the fireplace as well as the fireplace itself will probably be of stone in this basement room with stone shelves supported by stone corbels, giving the whole a massive and strong appearance.

A rough-finished insulating board stenciled in color will lend itself as a medium for exercising the individual imagination of the owner, who will probably feel that in this downstairs room he may follow a freer decorative scheme than would be possible in rooms above stairs. Such boards could be stained to resemble big wooden beams, giving somewhat the effect of a grill room.

A floor finished in tile or in cement painted in brilliant colors would form a fitting base to such a room. Preserves, canned goods and the Winter supply of apples will be lodged in the fruit room with its many feet of shelving for holding things.

In the room at the rear which is devoted to keeping the house warm is the boiler, the water heater and a tank for oil in case oil-burning equipment is used. The combustion chamber of the built-in chimney-fed incinerator is likewise situated here. Soiled clothes decend the clothes chute from second and first floors directly into a special store room. This is large enough in size for the storage of screens during the Winter and storm doors during the Summer.

Handy Man's Work Bench.

In the boiler room a broad shelf is suggested for the use of the handy man who likes to work around the house. Here he may keep his tools, his bits of lumber, and screws and nails for the repairing of decrepit furniture and the other odd jobs which fall to his lot.

Electric or gas dryer, two laundry tubs, an electric washing machine and an electric ironing machine are suggested as equipments for the up-to-date laundry. An ample number of electric convenience outlets are provided so that these equipments may be easily attached when they are put to use.

Three picturesque bedrooms with their sloping ceilings giving quaint background to furnishings are found on the second floor. Two of the three have interesting alcoves and unexpected corners where odd pieces of furniture may be tucked away. The floor area of one bedroom is considerably enlarged through the space under the dormer windows, which is added in actuality to its 132 square feet.

Each bedroom has a large closet for the occupant's wardrobe. A private bath is attached to the principal bedroom, while the two others are serviced by one bath. In this large bath, space is designated for a dressing table, the room's measurement of 8 feet 6 inches by 11 feet insuring ample "turning-around" place for the full use of such a dressing accommodation. It is from this bathroom also that soiled clothes and bed linens go down to the basement laundry. The stairs are well lighted with a window on the upper platform and one at the foot.

Arthur Bates Lincoln, consulting architect, estimates that the 26,964 cubic feet contained in this house may be built for approximately $15,000 in the neighborhood of New York City.

Information as to cost and when blueprint working drawings and specifications ready to build from will be available can be obtained by addressing Small Homes Bureau, care of THE NEW YORK TIMES. Please refer to Plan 48.

HOME OWNERSHIP AN ASSET

That the ownership of a home is regarded as an asset by the employer of labor is indicated in a recent report by the National Association of Real Estate Boards, which says that while no good worker will be turned down by a big employer because he does not own his home, the casual mention of the fact that he is making payments on a mortgage will favorably impress the man who is doing the rising, because the home owner is good for the company.

The report quotes a recent statement by F. Edson White, president of Armour & Co., to the effect that the more home owners there are among a company's employes the better it will be for the company, and also the view of P. S. du Pont, chairman of the board of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., who said the fact that a man is able to purchase a home is indication of past ability and trustworthiness.

"The employe who owns a home in the vicinity of a factory or office where he works is more inclined to remain in his position and to work harder to retain it than a man who either rents a home or has quarters in a boarding house," said Mr. du Pont. "On this account, corporations are naturally favorable to the class of employes who will purchase a home.

"The big manufacturer, however, warns employers against encouraging workers to undertake home ownership just to become a home owner, and points out that the employe involved in too heavy payments may not be an asset to a company.

"Employers should be careful not to state the home-owning proposition in a way that will lead employes to invest in a home simply because it is desirable to become a home owner. Making a purchase requiring payments beyond a man's means or making a purchase on value beyond what is reasonable may involve an employe in a way that will make him less desirable.

"The purchase of real estate must, therefore, be recommended guardedly, with certainty that the offerings are not only reasonable as to values, but not too burdensome as to time of payment. I am not one who believes in indiscriminate real estate ventures."

According to F. Edson White, steady, reliable employes who have pride in their jobs and a sense of responsibility are worth much to any business enterprise.

"Ownership of a home is a great factor in developing reliability and responsibility in a man," explains Mr. White. "The home owner feels that he is definitely a part of the community; he takes an active interest in it and can be counted on to boost it when opportunity presents itself. The more home owners there are among a company's employes the better it will be for the company.

"It is regrettable that home owning carries with it, in some places, rather heavy penalties in the form of taxes. I am hopeful that the time will come when there will be a premium on home ownership rather than a penalty. Certainly the home owner, on the average, has more incentive for good citizenship and good workmanship."

INSURANCE IS PART OF HOUSING PLAN

Bronx Citizens to Study Proposal for Tenant-Owned Apartment Houses.

A plan which its sponsors claim is designed to provide tenant-owned apartment houses for wage-earners will be outlined by the originator, George Donnelly, president of the United Tenants' Insured Homes Corporation, at the January meeting of the Fordham-Bedford Community Council in Public School 46, Briggs Avenue and 196th Street, the Bronx, tomorrow night.

Mr. Donnelly organized a group of tenants who went to Albany in Mamh, 1920, demanding emergency housing legislation. He explains that the plan calls for pooling of initial cash payments and subsequent monthly rentals by all tenants of an apartment house for the purpose of ultimately vesting ownership of the building in the occupants.

He states that prospective tenants under this plan would select their own managing company to arrange the details of the contracts, have charge of collecting rentals and paying off mortgages on the houses and act as agents to obtain new occupants.

He proposes the purchase of existing buildinsg as well as the erection of new structures. The plan would provide for insuring the lives of all insurable members of a tenant family to cover the sum amounting to the balance of the cost of the apartment in question as a means of protecting the family from losing its investment in case of death.

In case a tenant desired to withdraw from the project, the managing company would be authorized to resell the suite, turning over to the former occupant the sale price less the sum required for reconditioning the rooms. The managing company would be one of the two trustees of each building purchased. The other would be a bank.

The plan, Mr. Donnelly asserts, is the result of study of the needs of wage earners with insurance companies and real estate men. He believes the cost would be lowered through elimination of the speculative builder's profit, and reports that many citizens and public officials of the Bronx are interested in such a project. Among these, he states, is William J. Weber, member of the Board of Education, who is chairman of the board of directors of the United Tenants' Insured Homes Corporation. The plan is designed to care for the needs of persons of modest means who wish to establish permanent living quarters of their own in convenient locations within New York, he says.

EXPECTS RECORD YEAR IN BUILDING ACTIVITY

J. A. Hall Advocates Bureau of Commerce for State as Industrial Benefit.

With the construction activities urged by President Hoover and pledged to him by business leaders as a favorable influence, new building records should be set this year, in the opinion of J. A. Hall, vice president of the New York State Association of Real Estate Boards and secretary-treasurer of the Empire State Business Alliance.

A large volume of construction work will mean increased activity for real estate owners and operators as well as brokers, Mr. Hall predicts. He urges real estate men to support the legislative program of the New York State Association of Real Estate Boards, particularly the plan for establishment of a State Bureau of commerce and the proposal for a tax survey commission.

"Real property owners in New York," he says, "have before them a greater opportunity to promote the interests of the State generally, and therefore their interests, than has ever been presented, and that is through the establishment of a bureau of commerce in the State Government, the movement for which started last year at the suggestion of the speaker, to promote and foster our present industries, for every help and encouragement we can give to the small industries of today will help make them the big industries of tomorrow and further to secure new industries for every section of the State.

"The owners of real property have one of the biggest opportunities presented to them that has ever been offered in the last half a century, to secure a real equalization of the tax burden. From time immemorial real estate has been paying 75 per cent to 80 per cent of all of the taxes. Today it represents only about one-third of the wealth and therefore it is time that some of the burden was lifted from real property and extended to other types of wealth.

"At this session of the Legislature measures are being presented to provide for the appointment of a tax survey commission, made up of representatives of both houses of the Legislature, the State Tax Commission, and including representatives of all of the taxable interests of the State. The function of this commission will be to study all of our tax laws."

WESTCHESTER HOMES.

New Dwellings at Westminster Ridge Are Well Occupied.

Twenty-eight homes have been built in the residential development known as Westminster Ridge, in the White Plains section of Westchester County, states Fred P. Stafford, president of the development concern, and all but three have been sold. Among the purchasers were Charles W. Fowle, Frederick M. Holbrook, Wells F. Wise, W. C. Collins, William R. Foster and Frank B. Madden.

Plans have been approved and the contract let for a Colonial type community house on the shore of the lake. Skating parties and other Winter sports are greatly enjoyed by the residents. The private lake is used for swimming during the Spring and Summer. The new George Washington school adjoins the entrance to the property.

SAFETY IS SOUGHT ON WRECKING JOBS

Merchants' Committee Drafts New Rules Designed to Protect Workers.

INSURANCE RATE IS HIGH

Building Code Change Would Prohibit Floor Openings for Dumping Materials to Cellar.

More stringent regulations governing methods to be used in demolishing old buildings in New York will be included in the new building code being prepared by the Merchants' Association at the request of Mayor Walker, it was learned yesterday.

The regulations have been drafted by the subcommittee studying protection of the public and workmen, and are designed to lessen the number of accidents in demolition work, considered one of the most hazardous of the building trades. The experts charged with drawing up these rules have finished their task and have presented their findings to the central committee of the Merchants' Association for enactment into law as soon as a few other committees have presented their recommendations.

The problem which the report attempts to solve is of peculiar interest at the moment because of the protest made last week to Mayor Walker by Alexander Zinovik, president of Housewreckers Union Local 95, over the new system many wrecking contractors have adopted in their operations. The new plan calls for breaking openings through floors from top to bottom of the building through which workmen may dump débris direct to the cellar. Contractors are reported to be able to speed up demolition work considerably, regardless of height, by using this method instead of the old system of clearing away floor by floor and sending the débris down floor by floor on chutes. The new method would be prohibited in the new code.

Formal demand has been made by the union on the employing house wreckers to abandon the breaking-through method and to return to the old way of demolishing buildings by Feb. 1.

An official of the New York State Industrial Board pointed out that workmen's compensation rates covering wrecking crews are practically the highest in the building industry, being about $30 on every $100 of wages paid. The board's figures on accidents in this trade are included in the general heading of "building accidents," so that yearly figures are not available in its offices covering accidents on demolition jobs alone. The board kept separate figures for the year ended June 30, 1928, which showed 373 accidents on such work here, resulting in nine fatalities and permanent partial disability to seventy-four workers. Mr. Zinovik, in his statement to Mayor Walker, asserted that there were twenty fatalities in this field last year and held the new wrecking system responsible for three deaths on one Wall Street operation within a month.

William G. Wheeler, executive secretary of the committee on accident prevention of the Building Trades Employers' Association, in his annual report for 1929, indicated that some progress in reduction of accidents in construction of buildings had been made. He pointed out yesterday that the work of the committee did not cover demolition jobs, since wrecking concerns are not members of the association, but stated that the work would cover that phase of the subject later. He expressed the belief that the method of breaking through all floors at once could be made less hazardous if properly conducted, through adequate shoring of walls and floors. Mr. Wheeler considers the new method a more systematic way of removing old buildings, although he admitted that as conducted by some concerns now it was likely to have a "telling effect on compensation rates."

It was learned that the rules for demolition to be included in the new building code would do away with the breaking-through method and would require return to the floor-by-floor system, allowing opening through one floor only at a time, with proper space for chutes. Storage of material on the floor being torn down would be prohibited, and the chutes would have to be enclosed, with protective gates at the bottom of a drop not to exceed thirty feet. Exits would be kept free or debris and dust hazard, considered of particular importance to the health of workmen, would be lessened through rigid watering regulations. Before beginning an operation all glass from windows and doors would be removed and the openings boarded.

WHY OUR MEN ARE HIGHLY PAID.

We always have a place in our organization for a man we can develop into a large producer—both for himself and us. Previous experience in our work is not necessary. We do require aptitude, ambition and a disposition for hard work.

Every year our company—one of the oldest and largest real estate and realty investment houses in America—has done a phenomenal business in January and February. Each year during these months we stage a special campaign with special sales aids and unprecedented terms. This gives our men a chance to get a head-on start during the Winter months over the men of all other organizations.

This is typical of the aggressive policy which keeps our men among the highest paid workers and biggest earners in their field. Backing their climb to large commissions is the Harmon prestige, built around the successful merchandising, over a 43-year period, of some 200 million dollars' worth of land in 34 cities; the high-class development of the properties we sell; and the remarkably easy and appealing terms which put our offerings within reach of every investor and prospective home-owner. (Our company wrote the first instalment real estate contract ever written, in Cincinnati in 1887.)

There is a place in our organization for you if you are the type of man who does not know it all, but does know how to learn; who does not believe one can get something for nothing, but does want to turn his abilities into a large earning power; who does not want a soft snap, but is eager for opportunity.

If you are aggressive, ambitious, a good mixer, and have self-confidence in the place where many men have just an inferiority complex, we want to talk with you. Please ask for Mr. Mortimer, 15th floor. If you are not free in the daytime, come in Tuesday evening at 8 P. M. to Room 310 on the third floor.

A SALESMAN'S OPPORTUNITY.

The Dartnell Corporation requires a capable specialty salesman who is ready to knuckle down to the development of a territorial business of his own in New York that he can nurse along through the years; the man we engage will not look upon this as "my next job"—nor will he be after a quick clean-up; he will be a solid citizen, ready to build for permanence.

Our plan for distributing organized sales information has gained an enviable reputation among leading executives in twelve years; the men who can sell it are round young business men with creative minds and a demonstrated ability to sell intangibles consistently.

We will set the right man up in a territory that already has a good volume of running business; he will be given a small salary for the maintenance of this business—for which he will render constructive service to our present customers; in addition he will be paid a liberal commission for new business which he secures.

Our clients stick and renew; renewal commissions are an important factor in building an ever-increasing income; we have sufficient confidence in our plan to sell it on a liberal trial offer which makes it easy for the right man to roll up good volume from the start; if you can really sell ideas, apply by writing complete details of your experience; include your telephone number. J. H. Frohlich, The Dartnell Corporation, 274 Madison Av.

MANAGED BY OCCUPANTS

George Donnelly to Explain His Project to Buy and Erect Multiple-Family Buildings.

Continued growth in the business section of Jackson Heights, L. I., residential community, is reported by the Queensboro Corporation, which states that the new English Gables stores in Twenty-fifth Street between Roosevelt and Polk avenues are filling a trade need.

Carl G. Skog, vice president of the corporation, points out that the new business centre was the result of a decision reached several years ago, when the need for a unified trade district became apparent.

"The logic of the situation pointed to Twenty-fifth Street," he said, "because it is the street leading directly to the rapid transit station and since it connects the two most important business streets at Jackson Heights, Polk Avenue and Roosevelt Avenue. In order to make this location available two things were necessary to be done, first, a change in the zoning from residence to business, and second, the physical widening of the street from thirty to forty feet, so the street would carry the increased traffic developing from increased use.

"The Board of Estimate and Apportionment, two years ago, changed the zoning from residence to business, and the Queensboro Corporation, owning a large portion of two sides of the street, constructed the first unit store building, 240 feet long, with stores on the first floor and offices on the second. This construction was carefully planned and based upon a noted architectural development in London.

"The operation was followed by a second one, 100 by 100 feet, on the southwest corner of Twenty-fifth Street and Polk Avenue, immediately adjoining the English Gables group, and largely occupied by the Queensboro Corporation for its general and executive offices, but carrying along the store development on the Twenty-fifth Street front.

"The response to this business section has been very satisfactory. This type of store centre has been carried out in other sections of the country with advantage to the communities in which they are located."

NEW BANK BUILDING.

Central Hanover Plans 17-Story Structure on Church Street.

Plans for immediate erection of a bank and office building at the northeast corner of Church and Franklin Streets were announced yesterday by the Central Hanover Bank and Trust Company. It will be a seventeen-story structure and will house the present West Broadway branch. The structure will be 240 feet high and will be topped by a penthouse.

The building will have a frontage of seventy-five feet on Church Street and an equal frontage on Franklin Street, with the main entrance on Church Street, according to the plans prepared by Cross & Cross. It will be of modern renaissance design with brick and limestone exterior.

Marc Eidlitz & Son is the contracting firm and the Charles G. Edwards Company renting and managing agents for the building, which is expected to be ready for occupancy about Jan. 1, 1931.

On the site formerly occupied by the mansion of Commodore Elbridge T. Gerry on Fifth Avenue at Sixty-first Street the forty-one-story Hotel Pierre is nearing completion.

The George A. Fuller Construction Company is building the structure, which is due to be completed Oct. 1. The hotel will contain approximately 1,000 guest rooms arranged to provide suites up to nine rooms. The lower floors will contain a large ballroom, dining hall and banquet rooms. The project is sponsored by Walter P. Chrysler, Otto H. Kahn and Charles E. Sabin, with Charles Pierre as president and operating manager. Schultze & Weaver are the architects.

Steel work is scheduled to be completed about Feb. 1. The brick, limestone and terracotta façade is in place halfway up the tower.
